GM seeking foreign luxury car line

By JESSE SNYDER

DETROIT—General Motors Corp. is shopping for a European luxury auto maker to become GM's seventh domestic car division and plug a marketing gap that Buick and Cadillac haven't filled.

"We have looked at a number of companies in Europe," said Robert Stempel, vp-group executive of GM's Buick-Oldsmobile-Cadillac group.

Bayerische Motoren Werke AG, Munich, is high on the list. Its chairman, Eberhard von Kuenheim, visited GM last spring. BMW confirmed it has had talks with GM, as well as with Chrysler and Ford, but has shown little interest in being acquired. Company stock is publicly traded but 60% controlled by the German Quandt family.

With expected U.S. sales of 80,000 units this year, BMW is firmly entrenched in the "functional luxury" segment that GM covets. Segment leader Volvo is expected to be just above 100,000 units this year. "Luxury" segment leader Cadillac is expected to finish the year with more than 300,000 unit sales.

Mr. Stempel said GM is talking with more than one European company. Separately, GM is negotiating with a robot-making subsidiary of Italy's Fiat.

GM's last major acquisitions in Europe were made in the 1920s: Vauxhall Motors Ltd., Luton, England, in 1925 and Adam Opel AG, Russelsheim, West Germany, in 1929. Those companies have become the backbone of GM's European operations.

With $7.8 billion in cash at the end of the third quarter, GM is increasingly willing to consider acquisition of an import name-brand product to gain an expensive, sporty car, although buying an auto maker is only one option for GM. Other possibilities include joint ventures or supplier agreements

SAG union fears kiss of AIDS

LOS ANGELES—The pall of fear that AIDS has spread over the acting community touched tv commercial production last week in the form of a new demand from the Screen Actors Guild.

The actors' union said it will require that actors, including those in commercials, be given advance notice if "open-mouth kissing" is required.

The step follows earlier disclosures that actor Rock Hudson suffered from AIDS, or acquired immune deficiency syndrome, while playing a romantic lead in ABC's

Stone & Adler, Chapman merge

By PAUL L. EDWARDS

NEW YORK—The Young & Rubicam Direct Marketing Group is merging Chapman Direct Marketing with Stone & Adler's office here.

Although it is Stone & Adler's New York office that is being closed, the move effectively eliminates Chapman as one of the three direct-marketing agencies that comprised the DMG.

Arthur Klein, president of the group, said the merger creates the seed for a second Y&R direct-marketing network that would complement its Wunderman, Ricotta & Kline network.

The new office will be formally known as Chapman/Stone & Adler. Chapman president William Sutherland will keep that title and add the title of chairman of the executive committee of Stone & Adler. He will report to Stone & Adler chairman-ceo Richard Colligan.

Stone & Adler—headquartered in Chicago and with additional offices remaining in Toronto—is expected to report from $70 million to $75 million in billings this year, while Chapman may reach $50 million.

The combined billings won't alter Stone & Adler's No. 3 position

Crisis of confidence

Ghost of Christmas past haunts sellers

An Advertising Age roundup

Oshman's Sporting Goods has set its bait for Christmas. The southwestern retailer is deferring payments—interest free—on all consumer purchases made before Dec. 24.

RETAIL FORECAST

This is the first in a series.

Oshman's isn't the only retailer taking out insurance on Christmas. Many retailers are predicting decent Christmas sales and have kept inventories tightly controlled as a hedge to improve earnings. But, erratic sales during the last several months and seven fewer shopping days between Thanksgiving and Christmas than last year are keeping them guessing.

"Sales have been unpredictable," said Robert Benham, president, Halls department stores, Kansas City. "You get two good months, then a bad one. September was tough, maybe because financing deals on cars cut into other sales. Then October was solid, giving us three good months out of four. But we're still apprehensive because every time we get a good head of steam we soften up."

Indebtedness is lower in Denver than in other major markets, according to the Colorado Retail Council. Even so, the city's retailers say shopping trends there are ill-defined. "One week's up and one week's down," said Randy Barberis, vp-marketing, May D&F stores.

This fall's stop-and-go sales are prompting stores once again to try a little harder to reach the consumer. Retailers, if they can help it, are loathe to repeat last year's spiraling rounds of spontaneous price cutting and insist they will try to stick to planned price pro-

U.S. coin drive to spawn a $10M job

Washington—The U.S. Treasury this week is expected to recommend a full-blown marketing push for a proposed new gold coin and will be looking next spring for an agency to handle the estimated $10 million campaign.

Marketing of the coin wouldn't begin until October, 1986, to avoid interfering with the Statue of Liberty coin campaign that will be in full swing next summer.

Big-city papers' FAS-FAX gains show slippage

By GARY LEVIN

Readers in Detroit were down on newspapers this year, while circulation results from other big-city dailies proved a mixed bag of gainers and losers, according to the Sept. 30, 1985, FAS-FAX report released last week by the Audit Bureau of Circulations, Schaumburg, Ill.

As the ABC prepared to host its 71st annual meeting in Chicago (see related story on Page 96), circulation gains made earlier this year by some major dailies (AA, May 6) began showing signs of erosion.

Although over-all readership was up in Los Angeles, both Detroit papers posted significant circulation declines.

In other competitive markets such as Boston, Dallas and San Francisco, gains by one daily apparently came mostly at the expense of its crosstown rival. Robert Maynard's Oakland Tribune, for example, for the first time in recent history overtook Hearst Corp.'s San Francisco Examiner in daily circulation.

A.H. Belo Corp.'s Dallas Morning News continued to widen its lead over Times Mirror Co.'s Dallas Times Herald.

Unreported figures for the Chicago Sun-Times, New York Post and St. Louis Globe-Democrat made readership comparisons for those cities unavailable. In most other cities, circulation appears to have increased, though not with the strength of previous margins.

Gannett Co.'s USA Today showed an average 0.7% increase to 1,170,559 copies for the six months ended Sept. 30, not including 182,338 bulk paid circulation. The national edition of Dow Jones & Co.'s Wall Street Journal dropped more than 50,000 copies—or 2.6%—to 1,908,913.

In New York, the Times posted a 3% daily circulation gain to 963,365 and a smaller Sunday gain of 1.2% to 1,572,498. Tribune Co.'s Daily News gained more than 6,000 copies to register a 0.4% increase to 1,353,156—still the nation's largest-circulation general daily—while its Sunday figures fell 3.5% to 1,662,026.

Every Los Angeles edition showed circulation gains both daily and Sunday, with the exception of Hearst's Herald-Examiner, which dropped 4.5% on Sunday to 206,109, despite daily gains of 1.4% to 236,561 in the same period. Times Mirror's flagship, the Los Angeles Times, gained 0.6% daily to register 1,054,123 and 1% on Sunday for a 1,311,858 total. Tribune Co.'s Daily News, concentrated in the San Fernando Valley, gained 4.4% daily, posting 150,403. Its Sunday circulation was 168,947, an increase of 3.9% from a year earlier.

Tribune Co., however, is expected to swap that paper for another in the wake of its $510 million purchase of KTLA-TV, Los Angeles.

That company's flagship Chicago Tribune, which shifted from an

Nike's special lines slash Chiat's billings

By BRIAN LOWRY

Nike Inc.'s move away from mass marketing toward specialized product lines is cutting drastically into its billings at Chiat/Day, Los Angeles.

Amid rumors that Chiat would lose the account entirely to Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore., Nike insists it still has two agencies. The Beaverton-based athletic apparel company admits that Chiat's portion of Nike's $20 million budget has diminished, but maintains it has shifted some specialty products Chiat's way.

After chalking up two losing quarters in early 1984 to declining sales of running shoes, Nike is channeling its efforts into gymnastics, baseball, triathlon, bowling and other specialty shoes and apparel, much of which has been considered Wieden & Kennedy's assignment.

The marketing department also has been reorganized, assigning personnel to specific brands, rather than categories such as shoes or sweat suits.

"We've really become several small companies under one banner," Nike said.

The result is an ad budget—already cut drastically from last year—focused on specialty magazines. For example, the company recently unveiled Gymnastics, a new shoe and apparel line endorsed by Olympian Mitch Gaylord.

Ads for the products ran in International Gymnastics and USA Gymnastics.

Nike admits network tv is impractical for a product with such limited appeal.

Consequently, Chiat's award-winning corporate network tv ads and expansive outdoor board exposure are going by the wayside, leaving the agency to thrash it out with Wieden for specific product assignments.

Wieden, frequently regarded as Nike's "other agency" because of Chiat's high-profile tv and outdoor campaigns, is getting the lion's share of specific product work.

Chiat, however, is still assigned to Air Jordan, the company's hot product of the moment. Chiat's Christmas-oriented tv campaign pitting Chicago Bulls guard Michael Jordan one-on-one against

Miller, JWT take 'international' approach

It's a Lowenbrau world

By SCOTT HUME

It's too early to tell how consumers will react to Miller Brewing Co.'s latest positioning for Lowenbrau, now being trumpeted as an "international" rather than a domestic superpremium beer. But it's a safe bet that Anheuser-Busch, which last week announced plans to import Carlsberg, won't buy it.

The new Lowenbrau campaign from J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, broke Nov. 1 on network tv (AA, Oct. 31). In place of the "Tonight, let it be Lowenbrau" life-style, at-home positioning from previous agency Backer & Spielvogel, New York, the new creative carries the theme "This world calls for Lowenbrau."

It positions the brand as "the only beer brewed in the great beer-drinking countries." The new campaign also skews more heavily to on-premise scenes, where a sizable percentage of imported beer is consumed.

That "international" tack in some ways resembles the positioning that in November, 1977, led Anheuser-Busch to ask the Federal Trade Commission to investigate Milwaukee-based Miller and its then-agency McCann-Erickson, New York, for "alleged consumer deception" in its Lowenbrau advertising.

Miller in 1974 acquired exclusive import rights to Lowenbrau but since 1975 has been brewing it domestically and distributing it nationally since 1977.

A-B complained to the FTC that Lowenbrau ad copy—"When you want the taste of a truly great beer, there's really only one. Lowenbrau. Since 1383"—could "give consumers the impression that when they buy Lowenbrau they are buying the famous Munich beer."

The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms ultimately issued an advisory telling consumers to read carefully the labels when buying Lowenbrau in order to know whether they were buying a domestic or imported beer.

Tamara Hauck, Lowenbrau brand manager at Miller, said both the brewer and JWT extensively researched executions for the new campaign to ensure it doesn't create consumer confusion over the beer's origins.

"These ads fully inform consumers, very nondefensively, that Lowenbrau is brewed here, because we think that it is one of its assets," Ms. Hauck said.

The voiceover in JWT's Lowenbrau tv spots says the beer is "Brewed in Munich, brewed in England, Sweden, Canada, Japan and here in America, for 600 years of Bavarian heritage in one smooth American beer."

New Lowenbrau print ads also explain the connec-

Tv Week 6: Newcomers unwelcome

NEW YORK—Despite the recent baseball-playoff disruptions and ABC's $30 million-plus "North & South" miniseries, which is about to throw viewing patterns awry again, agency and network tv officials feel that general viewing patterns have been set.

As the new fall prime time season began Week 6 last week, those patterns indicated: Lukewarm viewer interest in most series newcomers, including the much-publicized anthologies, and signs of vulnerability among some seemingly established action/adventure shows, movie packages and even among the highest-rated prime time soaps.

This data has been provided by Media Records for exclusive publication in Advertising Age and may not be reprinted or published in any form without explicit permission from Media Records. All newspapers represented are subscribers to Media Records. For those newspapers that subscribe to Media Records National Advertising Reporting Service, Total Advertising data shown has been supplied by the publisher to Media Records and included in this compilation. All publisher supplied figures are converted to MRCS SAU inches by Media Records. These newspapers are indicated with an asterisk (*).

REPORTING METHODOLOGY

Media Records continues to measure in linage but due to the introduction of the SAU 6 column format Media Records has designed and developed a methodology with the approval of our subscribers, the INAME Measurements Committee, The ANPA/NAB Working Committee, The AAAA Newspaper Committee, and other industry groups.

The approved methodology is titled The Media Records Conversion System (MRCS) and is based upon the printed page area of each product of the newspaper and is a five step approach as follows:

1. Measure Printed Page
   Width and Depth in Inches
2. Determine Square Inches of Page
   Multiply Width by Depth Inches
3. Determine the Number of SAU Inches of Page
   Divide the Square Inches by 2.0625 (SAU Inches)
4. Measure the Total Lines of the Page
   Multiply Column Depth Agate Lines by the Number of Columns on the Page
5. Determine the Factor for Converting Measured Lines to Reported SAU Inches

all-day to a morning-only publishing cycle Aug. 19, also apparently has suffered from a production workers' strike that began July 18.

Both factors contributed to daily declines at the paper, the Tribune said. Those drops presumably would benefit Rupert Murdoch's Chicago Sun-Times, whose figures were not filed in time for the FAS-FAX report.

Tribune average daily figures for the April 1-to-Aug. 18 period were 762,842, down 1.7%, while Aug. 18-to-Sept. 30 results showed a steeper decline of 2.9%, to 753,758.

The sharper drop was due to the strike, which cost it 3,000 copies, the paper said, and to the elimination of the Green Streak afternoon edition after the strike began.

The Tribune's Sunday edition was up by just more than 1,000 copies—an insignificant percentage—to 1,138,731.

In Detroit, Gannett Co., which bought the Evening News Assn. for $717 million (AA, Sept. 2), may be displeased that the ENA flagship Detroit News' daily circulation slipped 1.7% daily and 3.2% on Sunday, to 645,016 and 837,821, respectively.

It could take comfort, however, with the knowledge that Knight-Ridder's Detroit Free Press posted even sharper declines of 2% daily to 634,466 and 6.1% on Sunday to 754,615.

Over-all, the Detroit papers have lost 24,000 daily copies, or 1.8% of their combined circulation, since September, 1984.

Denver dailies had contrasting results. With 1984 figures for both papers adjusted to reflect completion of audits there, the Denver Post in the '85 period reported a whopping 20% Sunday sales gain, to 413,477, while Scripps-Howard's Rocky Mountain News gained 1.4% Sunday to 371,102.

Daily, the Post dropped 5.7% to 213,042, while the News gained a mere 370 copies, posting a 0.1% increase to 317,930.

Further west in the Bay Area, Mr. Maynard's Oakland Tribune gained 2% daily to 151,108 and 1.2% Sunday to 155,020, perhaps at the expense of Hearst's San Francisco Examiner, which has a joint-operating agreement with Chronicle Publishing Co.'s San Francisco Chronicle.

The Examiner lost 6,000 copies—or 4.3%—daily, posting a circulation of 142,314, while the Chronicle held its own, gaining 1.8% to report a daily total of 545,622. The combined Sunday Examiner & Chronicle gained 1% to 706,345.

Texas papers waged their own circulation battles. The Dallas Morning News continued to pummel the rival Times Herald, gaining 4.9% daily for a total average circulation of 377,843 and adding 45,600 copies to its Sunday figures, posting a 10.1% increase to 500,719.

The Times Herald, in contrast, continued its slump, losing nearly 40,000 daily copies—or 14.6%—for a total of 231,224. It also lost the News' Sunday gains, dropping 11.2% to 331,589.

The Houston Chronicle gained 2% daily to 439,044 but lost 2.4% Sunday, posting an average circulation of 518,679. The Post lost 1% daily, falling further behind its rival with a 305,375, but gained by 3.1% Sunday to reach 365,303.

In Boston, Mr. Murdoch's Herald continued to challenge the venerable Boston Globe, though the Globe still commands a significant lead. The Herald gained 3.4% daily to 355,253, while the Globe lost 2%, dropping more than 10,000 copies to 509,464. On Sunday, both papers gained slightly: The Globe was up 0.8% to 799,200, while the Herald increased 0.6% to 282,487.

In St. Louis, Pulitzer Publishing Co.'s St. Louis Post-Dispatch continued to threaten the vitality of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, whose figures were not available. The P-D gained 4.8% daily to 277,527 and 0.5% Sunday, posting 481,618.#

wouldn't commingle."

While revitalizing its advertising effort, Rax also is interested in adding more "stuff" to its menu, which, in addition to its flagship roast-beef sandwiches, includes hot stuffed baked potatoes and an extensive salad bar. That bar now is being revamped in company-owned units to include a "Nacho Bar" where a variety of items (tortilla chips, Spanish rice, refried beans, melted cheese) is available for customers to assemble their own nachos. The Nacho Bar is the focus of radio spots only, although tv support may be added later.

Additionally, the chain is testing hamburgers in a few markets. Special ads in the new campaign that include mention of hamburgers begin airing this week. A breakfast menu that has been selectively tested for more than a year does not show enough promise to warrant expansion, Mr. Corrigan said.

All this activity comes on the heels of sharply lower earnings for the chain. For the fiscal year ended July 29, Rax reported a pretax loss of $4.78 million on revenues of $113.2 million, compared with the previous year's net income of $4.3 million on revenues of $92.7 million. The company eliminated 20 administrative positions after issuing that report, including one post in the marketing department.

When DMB&B was selected, Rax said it would double annual spending to $7 million to $10 million. Despite the disappointing yearend report, total spending still will be in that range during the next 12 months, Mr. Corrigan said.

Singing the r&b version of the "House that Rax Built" musical theme used in the initial tv spot is Cissy Houston (whose daughter, Whitney Houston, can be heard singing backup vocals). Dave Loggins (who sings the "Miller, Made the American Way" song) sings the country version used on radio; John Fiori sings the rock version.

Creative credits for the campaign go to director Hobby Morrison of Michael David Productions, New York, and editor Dick Stone of Stone Cutters, New York. Michael Zagar did musical direction and arrangements.

DMB&B's account team includes management supervisor Steve Gramps, account supervisor David Williamson, creative group heads Barry Logiudice and Dick Fitzhugh, producer Shelley Platt, art director Carolyn Braun and copywriter Barbara Byrne.#

bun, placing advertising in the paper.

Even today, 63% of Asahi's billings are placed in newspapers and only 10% in tv. Also, half of its newspaper billings are placed in Asahi Shimbun.

"It's not really an account management type of agency," one source said. "Clients look to Asahi for media placement."

Asahi also lacks international experience and only started an "international business promotion division" this year in preparation for its linkup with Saatchi.

However one source, agreeing that Asahi is more known for its print than tv work, said, "Given the difficulty of media buying in Japan, Saatchi considers that a strong rather than weak point." Asahi is "broader than an in-house agency," he said.

Saatchi officials rejected setting up a separate joint-venture agency, like DYR, a joint venture of Young & Rubicam and Dentsu.

Instead, the cooperative agreement with Asahi will allow clients to have access to Saatchi's best people, rather than "weaker" people who are often sent to man joint-venture agencies, Saatchi officials are saying.

The agreement appears similar to one between SSC&B:Lintas and Hakuhodo.

Saatchi previously had a loose affiliation with Dai Ichi Kikaku, Japan's fifth-largest agency, but terminated it this spring.

DIK's primary international alliance is with Doyle Dane Bernbach, which owns a small number of DIK shares. The Japanese agency also owns a small number of DDB shares, and the two agencies recently set up a joint venture in the U.S.

Mr. Gossett conceded that was one of the reasons Saatchi went looking for a new partner.#

Santa Claus breaks this month.

Nike also plans a spring tv campaign, but declined to specify by which agency for which product. Some ads will probably introduce Stickball, baseball-styled shoes for casual wear endorsed by New York Mets' pitching ace Dwight Gooden and Atlanta Braves' outfielder Dale Murphy (AA, Sept. 16).

Nike product manager David Smith said Chiat was working on a print ad for Stickball, but it is unclear who will get the broader assignment.

Though Nike insists shoes are still the main part of the company, corresponding t-shirts, pants and shorts are a growing portion of its inventory.

Recent line introductions built around athletes include BRS (Biking Running Swimming), endorsed by triathletes Mark Allen and Joanne Ernst, and a line of bowling shoes, bags and shirts, endorsed by bowler Marshall Holman. The company will promote both with print and the latter with tv, on the long-running Pro Bowlers tour telecasts.#

Peters' passion

Deep inside the management blockbuster, "A Passion for Excellence," the reader finds a sentence that captures the essence of Tom Peters' technique: "Anecdotal evidence awaits us by the bucketful." Peters' first book, "In Search of Excellence," embellished the simple message: Stay close to your customers and treat employes like champions. "A Passion for Excellence," the sequel, has bucketsful of anecdotes that all say: Here's how corporate managers are doing what we talked about in the previous book. See Page 4.

Despite the price tag—this Diamond View Suite with 30 seats costs $110,000 plus $20,000 for tickets while the 15-seat version goes for about half that amount—22 of the 28 that will be ready next season have already been spoken for through contracts or commitments.

Diamond View is the suite spot for heavy hitters

By Curt Schleier

The first ball game I ever attended was at the Polo Grounds in Manhattan. The Giants were playing the Phillies, Willie Mays was in center field and my grandstand admission for the doubleheader was $1.25.

The last ball game I attended was at Shea Stadium in Queens. The Mets were playing Montreal, there were still faint hopes of a divisional title in the air and I was sitting in a new Diamond View Suite that was on the market for $130,000 a season.

America is a wonderful country.

Certainly there have been a lot of games in between, but I saw most of them from the vantage point of a vendor for Harry M. Stevens. "Hey-can-of-beer-here. Last-call-on-the-alcohol. Last-time-on-the Ballantine. Hey-can-of-beer." Ah, I see you remember me.

Yes, those were the good days. Hot dogs were 25¢, beer was 35¢ and on a good day, say a Sunday doubleheader, I could come home with 30 bucks in my pocket.

The cost of food isn't all that's changed at the ball park. The stadium is only 20 years old but has been neglected. In a well publicized departure, Leon Hess moved the football Jets across the Hudson to the new Giants Stadium.

The Shea bathrooms were dirty, he said. No, he wasn't moving the team because Giants Stadium was bigger and already had special suites he could sell, both of which would mean greater profits.

Nevertheless, Mayor Koch could take a hint. Concerned he might lose the Mets, too, and anxious to woo Hess back, New York City committed to a $26 million refurbishing of the stadium, including the construction of 50 luxury boxes. Because advertising agencies have been known to entertain clients and potential accounts, the invitation to a visitor from ADVERTISING AGE seemed logical enough.

As the brochure says, "It is almost impossible not to feel important and special in a Diamond View Suite." And that's how I felt—important, special, a lot like the unexpected success returning to his high school reunion.

Michael Aronin, vp-marketing for the team, joined me in the suite. He's a longtime advertising and marketing executive, having held posts with Daniel & Charles, Columbia Records, Clairol and, most recently, as a vp of the consumer bank cards division of Citicorp. For the past week or so, he'd been very popular, because the Mets had been making a late-season charge at the Cardinals. Old acquaintances were coming out of the woodwork, saying, "You remember me; I was your best friend in the third grade."

We're sitting in the viewing area, which contains 30 theater-style seats, divided into three rows of 10. Aronin and I walk into the living area, which includes a table and lounge chairs, a wet bar and all the conveniences of home. It's separated from the viewing area by a plate-glass wall and, given this relative privacy, we talk.

He says 28 of the 50 boxes will be ready for next season, the remaining 22 for 1987. The Mets have guaranteed that the club will absorb all cost overruns.

Of the 28 ready for next year, 22 have already been spoken for, either with signed contracts or commitments. The suites come in two sizes: The 30-seat version we're in now and one about half the size, with 15 seats. The smaller one costs $60,000 a season on a five-year lease—$50,000 for the box itself, $10,000 for the tickets. The bigger ones go for $110,000, plus $20,000 for tickets.

In both cases, the lease is written to include 5% price increases in the base cost of the suite in years three through five. That's a great deal of money, but Aronin reports "no resistance," despite the possibility of tax legislation that would disallow this kind of entertainment expense.

"Companies are going to entertain anyway," he adds. "And this is a unique situation where you can play host to a captive audience for close to three hours."

Certainly the suite lives up to the advance notices in the brochure. It is

Grey gets Mitsubishi work

FOUNTAIN VALLEY, CAL.—Mitsubishi Motors of America is moving its $37 million account to Grey Advertising's new Orange County office from Mickelberry Corp.'s Cunningham & Walsh. Mickelberry's loss is somewhat eased with Tom Lawson's move to its Laurence, Charles & Free unit as president-ceo. Four McDonald's owner-operator groups and McDonald's national sales account are moving with him from Rosenfeld, Sirowitz & Lawson, where Mr. Lawson had served as chairman. Laurence Dunst yields LC&F's president-ceo title to become LC&F creative chief. Stephen Humphrey, chief operating officer-president of RS&L's New York operation, succeeds Mr. Lawson. The agency becomes Rosenfeld Sirowitz & Humphrey. Mr. Lawson's name will be added to the LC&F letterhead.

B&J's Finn quits

DALLAS—Bozell & Jacobs/Southwest chairman Peter Finn resigned this week after five years with the agency, citing "philosophical differences" with management.

Polaroid accounts adrift

NEW YORK—Ally & Gargano, which has resigned Polaroid Corp.'s $30 million consumer account, also will lose the Canadian consumer and industrial photography accounts it was scheduled to assume from Doyle Dane Bernbach (AA, Oct. 14). The winner of the review for Cambridge, Mass.-based Polaroid's 7000 system (AA, Nov. 4) —BBDO; Della Femina, Travisano & Partners; Needham Harper Worldwide, or Ogilvy & Mather—also is likely to get the U.S. and Canadian consumer assignments, but the fate of the Canadian industrial account is undecided, sources say.

Weightman buys Schaefer

PHILADELPHIA—Weightman Advertising has reached an agreement in principle to acquire Schaefer Advertising, Valley Forge. The agency would have combined annual billings of $76 million, making it the largest independent agency in this market and second only to Lewis, Gilman & Kynett, a unit of Foote, Cone & Belding.

Matchbox pushes BabyCise

MOONACHIE, N.J.—Matchbox Toys (USA) Ltd. is planning BabyCise as one of its major 1986 product introductions. BabyCise will encompass home video and child development toys and products for infants and preschoolers. Matchbox's agency is Ciociola & Co., New York.

Conflicts at P&G-Searle?

CHICAGO—Needham Harper Worldwide says it does not intend to resign $7 million-plus in business it has from G.D. Searle & Co.'s consumer-products division following purchase of that unit this week by Procter & Gamble, Cincinnati. P&G is expected to fold the Searle brands into its Norwich Eaton Pharmaceuticals unit or maybe recently acquired Richardson-Vicks. AA reveals most win-some directors

By Kevin Brown

Comparing advertising awards is a touchy job. Comparing directors of commercials is even touchier. But when the U.S. competitions are screened and re-screened, a few names always return. These are the commercial directors in the U.S. who have won the most awards.

Mark Coppos and Ridley Scott, big award winners for their work in 1984, directed the most talked-about spots of the year.

Those commercials, which will be remembered long after the awards are forgotten, are Mr. Coppos' "Manuals" spot for Apple Computer, via Chiat/Day, Los Angeles, with its instruction booklet floating gracefully to a table, and Mr. Scott's "Spaceship" for PepsiCo, via BBDO, New York, with its alien ship choosing an entire Pepsi machine over a single Coke.

Advertising Age, having reported on these noteworthy commercials, decided to gather a gallery of leading directors. To sort them out, AA began by looking at their awards.

Of dozens of international, national and regional advertising competitions, five were used to rank commercial directors for U.S. advertising. They include national Addy awards, given by the American Advertising Federation; Andy awards, given by the Advertising Club of New York; Art Directors awards, given by the Art Directors Club of New York; Clio awards, given by Clio Inc., and One Show awards, given by the One Club.

Each contest accepted advertising entries from throughout the U.S. and included various categories. Although none of these awards was given specifically to the director (with the exception of one Clio), many recognize technical excellence.

Contest	Number of awards	Points per award
Addy	8	8.88
Andy	10	7.10
Art Directors	3	23.67
Clio	47	1.51
One Show	3	23.67
TOTAL	71

Other awards recognized best commercials in product categories. Andy categories were based on scope—national, local, regional—cost and length of the commercial.

Bessies (Canada), Hatch (New England), Best in the West, Belding (Southern California) and district Addy awards were not considered for this compilation because of their regional nature.

Cannes and International Film & TV Festival of New York were eliminated because they are international. The Effies, given by the American Marketing Assn., were excluded from this ranking because they honor campaigns rather than single commercials.

Campaign categories within the competitions used in the ranking also were eliminated. The aim was to focus on award-winning commercials rather than campaigns.

Only first-place awards were used to rank the directors, because not all competitions offer a second place.

In determining the ranking, AA equalized the impact of each competition. To give all 47 Clios the same weight as all three One Shows—which in turn carry the same weight as 10 Andys—AA divided the total number of first-place awards (71) by the number of first-place winners in each contest.

For each award in each contest, the director received AA's "points-per-award" (see box).

Each director's points-per-award were tallied, and the directors were ranked. They are listed with the name of the award, agency, client and commercial.

All the competitions allowed their judges to be independent. For example, not every category need have a first-place winner. Judges were to give an honest appraisal of the commercials entered, with highest points going only to outstanding entries.

AA realizes that not all directors, agencies and clients enter these contests. Entry fees range from $35 to $85 a commercial, and many creatives do not seek this kind of recognition.

This ranking is not meant to minimize the accomplishments of other directors; rather, it is a look at 22 fine commercial directors and the honors bestowed on them by their peers. ■

Victor Kiam, a la Lee Iacocca, has a book out. Now he's hawking Remington razors—and his book—with money-back guarantees.

The man who would be Lee

By BRIAN MORAN

Electric-shaver wizard Victor Kiam, never one to delegate a tough sales job, has advised his big New York publishing house not to fuss about getting his first book onto the best-seller lists. He'll take care of it.

Remington Products' Mr. Kiam, the Lee Iacocca of the shaver business, hopes to match the book-selling success of Chrysler's chairman with "Going for It!"—a how-to tome on entrepreneuring that carries a money-back guarantee.

But Mr. Kiam won't depend on publisher William Morrow & Co. to get the job done. He plans personally to spend more than $4 million next spring to advertise the national rollout of his book on tv.

That's an unprecedented marketing expense for book publishing, where even the highest-profile titles rarely get more than $200,000 in ad support. Random House is spending about $125,000 to promote its major Christmas offering, James Michener's "Texas."

As Mr. Kiam tells it, William Morrow has taken a decidedly hands-off approach to his extravagant advertising plans.

"They said to me, 'Fine. You want to do that, you put up the money,' " Mr. Kiam said in a phone interview. Morrow has agreed to be liable for a set percentage of the ad expenses if "Going for It!" turns out to be a hit, he said.

In another move that's sure to shake up Publisher's Row, Mr. Kiam and William Morrow currently are test-marketing the book in three cities before the planned

New O&M-TWA tie stalls

By BRIAN MORAN

New York—Trans World Airlines abruptly canceled a planned announcement Nov. 8 that it would rehire just-fired Ogilvy & Mather to handle its account, at deeply slashed fees.

In the space of 18 hours, TWA made a stunning flip-flop on its agency plans after new owner Carl Icahn stepped directly into the picture.

On Nov. 7, TWA staff vp-advertising Erv Kaufman said the airline had decided to retain O&M, which was dismissed from the $70 million business Oct. 23 (AA, Oct. 28).

"An open-ended agreement has been made to extend the old contract," Mr. Kaufman said. Mr. Kaufman said O&M would continue to handle both creative and media and that an "incentive arrangement" had been added to the agency's contract providing for profit sharing if TWA's revenues increased.

Mr. Kaufman added that TWA planned to make a formal announcement on the new agreement the following day.

On Nov. 8, Mr. Kaufman could not be reached. Sally McElwreath, a TWA spokeswoman, said the carrier would have no statement on O&M's status and that any future pronouncements on advertising plans would no longer come from Mr. Kaufman but from Mr. Icahn.

"We are telling [agencies] who are interested in the account to talk to Carl Icahn," Ms. McElwreath

Lawson move no shock

By STEWART ALTER

New York—The timing of this week's breakup of the 15-year-old agency team that was Rosenfeld, Sirowitz & Lawson—with Tom Lawson departing as president—was a surprise, but the signs of trouble had been there.

"We had had discussions with each other over a period of time, though we didn't know specifically until Monday morning [Nov. 4] that he was leaving," said Len Sirowitz. The three partners, Messrs. Sirowitz, Lawson and Ron Rosenfeld, had been together Nov. 1 at ceremonies in which Mr. Sirowitz was inducted into the Art Directors Club hall of fame.

Mr. Lawson also surprised his partners the same day he announced he would be leaving by running an ad hailing Mr. Sirowitz' Hall of Fame status as well as Mr. Rosenfeld's previous induction into the Copywriters Hall of Fame.

The ad, seeking new business, requested that interested advertisers call Mr. Lawson at RS&L's phone number. Mr. Rosenfeld said that while he knew the ad was being planned, he was surprised at the ad's timing since it broke simultaneously with Mr. Lawson's resignation announcement.

The agency immediately was renamed Rosenfeld, Sirowitz & Humphrey, reflecting Stephen Humphrey's elevation to president from chief operating officer/president of the New York office.

Mr. Lawson was reported to be headed for Mickelberry Corp.'s Laurence, Charles & Free, where he would become president-ceo, succeeding Laurence

McDonald & Little shut

By STEWART ALTER and RUSSELL SHAW

Ted Bates Worldwide's decision last week to close McDonald & Little has thrown about $10 million worth of business up for grabs.

Bates said it decided to close the Atlanta-based agency, which it purchased in 1982, because it was "no longer viable."

The decision followed M&L's steady loss of existing accounts and inability to pick up any new business in two years.

New York-based Bates had invested about $2 million this year to try to keep the shop afloat, sources say.

Bates will retain M&L chairman Mike McDonald as a consultant. "I'm feeling terrific," Mr. McDonald said. "I have no statement now. My plans are to continue. My job right now is to make sure that our clients' needs are served through the 90-day notice period, help the staff get good positions and relocated if possible, to protect the interests of Ted Bates and make sure all of our obligations to creditors are discharged in an orderly manner."

McDonald & Little's largest client was Simmons Co., Atlanta, with a budget of about $6 million.

"Our option would be looking at other agencies," said Larry Alm, vp-advertising and merchandising at the bedding company. "There are also some modular options, like farming out creative and research, while doing media buying ourselves."

Simmons is a unit of Wickes Cos., Santa Monica,

Curtains at Ash/LeDonne

By STEWART ALTER

Ash/LeDonne realized a few years ago that having a client roster that read like the Tony Awards wasn't going to be enough. Broadway's business had been falling off, and the agency started diversifying its client list, getting into other entertainment areas.

But in the end, it would be the theater that would drop the closing curtain on the agency. Ash/LeDonne was done in by "The Tap Dance Kid."

The agency's Los Angeles office couldn't collect a $290,000 bill from the West Coast producers of "The Tap Dance Kid."

The debt pushed Ash/LeDonne to more than $1 million in uncollected receivables, with more than $700,000 in media bills due.

On Oct. 31, agency president Jeffrey Ash told his 30 employes in New York and about a dozen in Los Angeles that the agency couldn't cover their checks. Ash/LeDonne was calling it quits.

"We were hurt a few years ago on the West Coast when 'Sweeney Todd' owed us $190,000," he said. "Collecting money is one of the major nemeses of our business. There are lots of good producers who are honorable and pay their debts. And then there are others who just run up bills and want you to create ideas today to get into tomorrow's paper."

Mr. Ash, who now plans to "take a few weeks and check out my options," has been in the entertainment advertising business for a while. He had worked at Blaine/Thompson, once the leading theatrical ad agency. His father had been one of its

Coke, Pepsi pit cherry colas 3

PepsiCo's first challenge to Cherry Coke is being fought in Canada amid the kind of secrecy that accompanies military maneuvers. In the U.S., Coca-Cola Co. beat Pepsi-Cola Co. to market with a cherry cola. But the sudden appearance of Cherry Pepsi in selected Canadian markets—just two days before Cherry Coke arrived on store shelves—caught Coke executives by surprise.

Mac deals out McD.L.T. 3

McDonald's Corp. last week made its McD.L.T. sandwich available nationwide and eligible for support from its huge network tv budget, which sources said it will get through Nov. 25. The national introduction for the sandwich was accomplished in less than a year, an uncharacteristically speedy systemwide rollout for the McDonald's system.

For John Moschitta, better known as "that fast-talking Federal Express guy," getting people to take him seriously is serious business. Especially on casting calls. Three years ago he uttered those fateful 450 word-a-minute lines: "Peter-you-did-a-bang-up-job-I'm-putting-you-in-charge-of-Pittsburgh-I-know it's perfect-that's-why-I-picked-Pittsburgh-Pittsburgh's-perfect-Peter-may-I-call-you-Pete..." That ack-ack performance won him a Clio award for best actor and brought renewed national awareness to Federal's overnight package-delivery service, but it also gave Moschitta a new challenge: Prove that his vocal chords work at speeds other than fast-forward.

New technologies and increased specialization are two of the factors spurring growth in marketing/advertising research. Special Report will look at the companies and people that are giving new vitality to the industry.

New products 1985: Fewer, but better

By NANCY GIGES

While the number of new products introduced in 1985 is far below that of a year ago, the quality of those products is getting better.

That's the conclusion drawn by the Initiatives Group from its Innovation Index, a systematic method designed to assess new-product development.

During the first half of 1985, the number of new products launched —2,332—was down 17% from 1984, but 341 new products this year have contributed innovative formulas, packaging, technology or positionings. This represents a 42% increase compared with last year, according to the index, which is obtained by dividing the number of innovations by the number of products introduced.

The index rose to 18.2% during the second quarter of this year, up from 8.3% in 1984.

The leading innovators are a mixed bag of large and small, old and new companies across the country, from Preventa Pak, Beverly Hills, Cal., with its six self-diagnostic kits, to Procter & Gamble, Cincinnati, which has picked up the mantle once again in new-product development.

The biggest increase in innovations occurred in packaging, in which 88 were recorded during the first six months versus 37 last year. Positioning innovations saw a rise of 42, to 107; technology up 6, to 11, and marketing up 5, to 5. The only decline came in formula innovations, down 4 to 130, although this segment still is the largest source of innovations.

Initiatives Group said one reason for the rise in packaging innovations is the diverse way packaging is being used to segment markets. For example, American Popcorn and Real Fresh have developed items aimed at the emerging microwave market for their popcorn and pea soup, respectively.

Other innovations are aimed at smaller families on the go, such as Henri's Salad Dressing To Go, Falbar's Wine in Glass and ready-made Golden Grain spaghetti.

Gillette has introduced Atra Plus, a razor with lubrication for people with sensitive skin, and Marcal Paper has compressed all the air out of its napkins package to take up less space in the cupboard and on retail shelves.

In the positioning area, the Initiatives Group sees marketers skillfully adapting successes from other categories. International Bakers has introduced a healthier snack—Pita Chips, and General Brewing, recognizing Americans' fascination with lotteries, has come up with Lotto beer, whose caps offer prizes of up to $1,000. Max Factor has introduced a body moisturizer in mousse form, and Clairol has added a hair-coloring mousse.

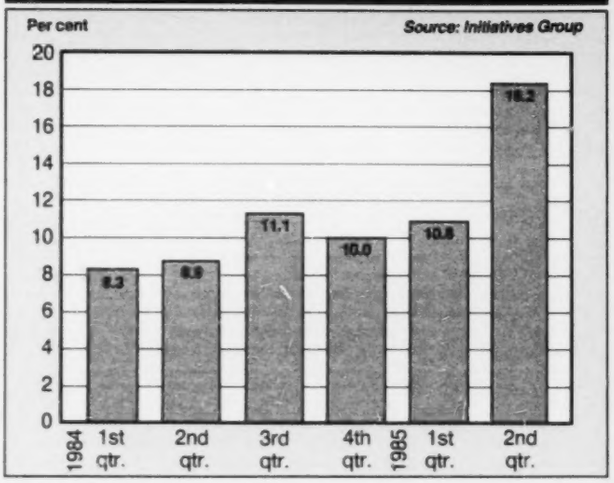
Innovation index



The Innovation Index

Innovation Index is a system of evaluating new products, established by the Initiatives Group, Toronto and New York. The index rates products in six categories—food, beverage, health & beauty aids, household, pet and miscellaneous. Each product can be awarded up to five stars, one for each of five areas—new technology, new formulation, new packaging, new positioning to either new users or for new usage and opening of a new market. The Innovation Index is obtained by dividing the number of innovations by the number of products introduced.

Squirt finds vitamins a Plus

By PATRICIA STRNAD

HOLLAND, MICH.—SquirtCo is introducing vitamin-enriched Diet Squirt Plus for diet and nutrition-conscious consumers.

"There is an emerging consumer awareness of health and fitness," said a spokeswoman for SquirtCo, the domestic franchiser of Squirt brand products. "Diet Squirt Plus is a natural vehicle for those who are concerned about health and drink a lot of nutritionally empty soft drinks."

Diet Squirt Plus, a reformulation of Diet Squirt, is targeted at 25-to-54-year-olds. It contains 50% of the U.S. Recommended Daily Allowance of vitamin C and 10% of the USRDA of five B complex vitamins.

However, SquirtCo cautions that grapefruit-flavor Plus is a vitamin supplement only and shouldn't replace a well balanced diet.

"Most people are on the go so much they don't eat right," the SquirtCo spokeswoman said. "We believe that adding nutrition helps fill a consumer-identified need for good-tasting soft drinks that are better for you."

Beverage Industry, a trade publication for bottlers, reported that 1984 soft-drink consumption surpassed that of water for the second year in a row.

Bottlers will replace Diet Squirt with the Plus brand by yearend, as they deplete their stocks of Diet Squirt. Squirt products are available regionally in all 50 states as well as Canada, the U.K., Mexico and several other Central American countries.

"Our commitment is to produce the very finest soft drinks possible," said J.W. Brooks, president of Squirt & Co., the privately held parent of SquirtCo.

"We are sensitive to consumer concerns," Mr. Brooks said. "While soft drinks will always be consumed first and foremost for fun and refreshment, Diet Squirt Plus satisfies that need while giving consumers added value."

Squirt & Co. prides itself on being an innovator in the soft-drink industry and is recognized as the first to sweeten its diet soft drink with 100% NutraSweet and to bottle soft drinks in plastic containers.

It also created the juice-added segment in the soft-drink category with Diet Squirt.

Competing juice-added diet soft drinks now include Pepsi-Cola's diet Slice, Procter & Gamble's diet Crush and R.J. Reynolds Industries' Diet Sunkist Plus (AA, Oct. 21).

SquirtCo believes it has accomplished another first by going a step further with vitamin-enriched Plus.

The soft-drink industry often has been criticized for failing to meet any basic nutritional needs, said John Baldari, account supervisor at Squirt agency Beber Silverstein & Partners, Miami. SquirtCo is providing bottlers with a 30-second tv spot for Plus. It will break in each market as the brand is introduced.

The humorous commercial features a family that argues whether it's the vitamins or taste that makes Plus so good.

Although the mother insists it's the taste that makes her "feel great," she continues to lift three big grocery bags or a stack of books with one hand and Plus in the other.

At the end, she lifts her husband and then her son high above her head and the son says, "I think it's the vitamins."

The creative team at Beber Silverstein included Russ Slaughter, creative director; Paul Spreadbury, copywriter, and Darry Gayle, producer.

The entire Squirt line receives about $3 million a year in advertising support.#

Shops flipped as new Coke fizzles

SSC&B gains Classic brand

By NANCY GIGES

Coca-Cola USA, still trying to regain marketing equilibrium after its April reformulation fiasco, last week reformulated its plan to market new Coke and Coca-Cola Classic under the megabrand umbrella.

In a sweeping agency realignment involving six brands billing more than $80 million, the Atlanta-based company split the agency assignment for its two cola brands.

The troubled new flavor stays at Interpublic's McCann-Erickson, New York; the more popular Coca-Cola Classic moves to sister agency SSC&B.

As it made the move to separate the two products and their ad campaigns, Coca-Cola revealed another about-face concerning its leading cola soft drink. The megabrand approach that company executives were trumpeting a few weeks ago has been replaced by what Coca-Cola USA president Brian Dyson terms brand "linkage."

In shifting new and old Coke brands, Coca-Cola balanced out billings as well as creative resources by transferring Cherry Coke, with its $20 million budget, and Tab, estimated at $10 million, to McCann from SSC&B.

The move, which was being talked about last month (AA, Oct. 21), came as no surprise. But it came a few months earlier than expected.

Ever since Coca-Cola faced up to the mistake it made when it removed original Coke from the marketplace and brought it back under the Classic name, company executives have indicated publicly they were committed to a megabrand strategy.

Only several weeks ago, exec vp-corporate marketing director Ira Herbert said the company intended to create a "megabrand—one enormous brand flying its banner over several different soft-drink categories—focusing on the total share of the industry rather than any single segment."

Placing the sugar cola brands at two different shops changes all that, especially because there is not likely to be much coordination be-

Ford puts $100M on table to power Taurus & Sable

By JESSE SNYDER and RAYMOND SERAFIN

DETROIT—Get ready for a $100 million ad blitz: Ford's got a Taurus for us, not to mention a Sable in the stable.

Ford Motor Co.'s biggest-ever marketing launch supports a $3 billion development investment in Ford Taurus-Mercury Sable.

"Get Ready," another Mercury "Big Chill" music commercial, is running, and two additional Sable spots begin airing Dec. 7 on the syndicated show "Deja View." Ford division, with 250,000 of the 400,000 first-year sales goal for Taurus-Sable breaks ads closer to the Dec. 26 introduction but will still dominate ad spending.

With a first-year sales goal comparable to Mustang, Fairmont and Escort, Ford is differentiating each division's version of the front-wheel-drive platform. Sable is positioned upscale of mainstream Taurus, with a divergent ad campaign.

Each division has a separate target audience. Ford division has "a new Taurus for us," in original music lyrics for its introductory commercial via J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit. Ford is aiming at a more mass-market group that leans toward domestic cars. Taurus is an "American car with a shape and feel we've never seen before."

Mercury will target what it calls "achievers," affluent, trend-conscious, well educated buyers who need more room for their families than imports and other small cars provide, said Charles Riley, senior vp-group director for Lincoln-Mercury agency Young & Rubicam, Detroit.

Retailers race for new ideas

By PAT SLOAN

NEW YORK—Always a trendy business, retailing is becoming even more so as new specialty stores spring up to capture the attention, imagination and pocketbooks of choosy consumers.

Among the current and about-to-occur "happenings" on the specialty scene:

- Coca-Cola Clothes this month takes the wraps off its Fizzazz stores here and in New Jersey, where shoppers will view a five-screen video display of clothes before descending to the lower level to walk through a "serving" line with a tray—cafeteria style—selecting clothes in the colors and sizes they want.
- On Manhattan's East side, Columbus, O.-based The Limited is opening a "super" specialty store housing Limited, Limited Express and Victoria's Secret stores under one roof, a concept that has flourished in Europe.
- Ciao Italia, brainchild of the former president

Specialty stores have developed innovative concepts, such as Coca-Cola Clothes' Fizzazz stores which feature a five-screen video display of fashions and a cafeteria-style serving line.

HIGHLIGHTS

Oh, so special 1
Retailing is becoming even more trendy as new specialty stores spring up. Among them: Coca-Cola Clothes debuts its Fizzazz stores; The Limited is opening a "super" specialty store; Ciao Italia readies its appearance as a "lifescapes" chain, and J. Bildner & Sons is running as a cross between a gourmet and convenience food store.

National tv ad market slides 3
The national tv advertising market is on the skids, and, for the first time publicly, CBS-TV admitted it was getting hurt by the slide. In a rare appearance before reporters and analysts, CBS executives blamed a sour advertising market on a dismal third-quarter performance—CBS' first quarterly earnings loss.

Net execs on endangered list 3
The tv networks' Who's Who list grew shorter last week as two top executives dropped out. With more personnel changes likely, especially at ABC, the list is expected to grow shorter still.

Electricity is in the air 4
Compact-disc players, stereo tvs and camcorders have cash-ready consumers eager to boost sales of electronics marketers this Christmas retail season, according to an informal Ad Age survey. Retailers' only problem appears to be getting—and keeping—the hot-selling items in stock.

Searle lusts for foreign affairs 6
Monsanto's G.D. Searle & Co. division is gearing up its NutraSweet group for an all-out offensive in international markets. Searle markets or expects to receive marketing approval soon for its NutraSweet aspartame sweetener in 30 to 40 nations.

Liberty's unhappy pursuit 12
The marketing program aimed at keeping Lady Liberty's torch lit has drawn fire from the news media. The Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Foundation is being charged with commercialization and abandoning grass roots fund-raising in favor of corporate sponsorships.

PSA flies ads back to Della Femina

San Diego—Pacific Southwest Airlines completed a five-year, round-trip journey last week when it landed its $12 million account at Della Femina, Travisano & Partners, Los Angeles.

Della Femina, which handled the carrier's account in 1979 and 1980, replaces DYR, Los Angeles.

The new billings, coupled with its recent award of the equally large Carl's Jr. business (AA, July 15), pushes the agency's West Coast office past the $100 million mark.

PSA vp-marketing Bill Roy implied that the decision to hire Della Femina reflects the airline's desire to upgrade the creative quality of its ads, which it feels declined under DYR's direction. PSA recently dropped its DYR-developed slogan—"We've got to be tough to Still struggling out from the shadow of last year's Olympics spending, seven of the nine U.S.-based publicly owned ad agencies reported drops in net income during the third quarter.

Continued revenue growth, however, represented an encouraging footnote.

The only two U.S. public shops to report third-quarter increases in net income were New York-based Ogilvy Group (up 7.1%) and Interpublic Group of Cos. (up 4.9%).

"The third quarter looked weird and crummy in certain respects," said Charles Crane, an analyst at Oppenheimer &

Cigaret sales smolder below 600 billion

By JOHN C. MAXWELL JR.

We expect 1985 cigaret industry volume to total about 597.5 billion units. That projection is based on the assumption that the industry again will have a yearend price increase.

We believe the numbers will be in the area of 590 billion-plus if there is no yearend price increase. This would compare with 600 billion in 1984—down 0.5% if the higher number occurs or a decline of 1.7% if lower.

Retail consumer sales are running about 1% below last year's level.

The difference between the two percentages is caused by excess trade inventory buildup.

The most dynamic segment of the market in 1985 is the price-value category.

It consists of: "No frills" and store brands from Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co., Durham, N.C., and Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., Louisville; the generic-price brands, such as Doral from R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., Winston-Salem, N.C.; the midprice brands, such as Liggett's Stride, and the price-value 25s—Reynolds' Century, B&W's Richland and New York-based Philip Morris Inc.'s Players Lights 25s, the latter currently in test market.

Shares of cigaret market

	Full Priced	Price Value	Total Mkt.(85)	Total Mkt.(84)	Change
Philip Morris	38.5	—	35.7	35.3	+0.4
R.J. Reynolds	32.5	24.9	32.0	31.6	+0.4
Brown & Williamson	10.6	26.4	11.8	11.3	+0.5
Lorillard	8.8	—	8.1	8.2	−0.1
American Brands	8.0	—	7.4	7.9	−0.5
Liggett	1.6	48.7	5.0	5.7	−0.7
Total	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	—
Market Share	92.8	100.0	7.2	100.0	—

For the full year, the discount brands had a 7.2% share compared with 5.5% in 1984. Nevertheless, the growth rate was below that of previous years.

This was not unexpected, because retail cigaret price hikes also have slowed down.

It's worth looking at each company's share of the full-price and the price-value segment. Notice that while Philip Morris has a 35.7% share of the total market, it has a 38.5% share of the full-price segment and currently doesn't have a national price-value entry.

By contrast, B&W and Liggett have greater price-value penetration. Full-price brands are far more profitable, though.

In general, 1985 saw little change in leading brands' market shares. The two exceptions were PM's Marlboro and New York-based Lorillard's Newport, which have the strongest franchises among younger smokers.

Marlboro, the No. 1 brand, improved its market share to 22.3%, up 0.7 share point over last year. It was helped by the national distribution of Marlboro 25s, now with the highest sales in this category.

Newport hit a new high of 3.4%, ahead of last year by 0.4 point.

PM's Virginia Slims also showed continued progress, aided by the fourth-quarter launch of its 120s line extension. Only modest shifts took place for most of the other major brands, including Reynolds' Camel, Salem, Vantage and Winston; B&W's Kool; PM's Benson & Hedges and Merit, and New York-based American Brands' Carlton.

PM's 35.7% total market share is a record. Reynolds and B&W also enjoyed share gains for the year. American Brands, Liggett and Lorillard suffered small declines.

Syndicast puts emphasis on specials

By JAMES P. FORKAN

NEW YORK—Syndicast Services, one of the nation's oldest barter syndicators, is looking to 1986 and 1987 with a roster that's heavy on specials and light on series.

The reasons are simple enough. Leonard Koch, Syndicast president, said the tv business in general is experiencing one of the slowest fourth quarters in memory. Given the tough economic climate and the fact that most new syndicated series fail, "it's in our best interests to emphasize specials," he said. Hit series such as King World's "Wheel of Fortune" are "very lucky things."

Although Syndicast's lineup is 80% specials, Mr. Koch said most are "continuing specials," events with one or more prior telecasts and with a following among viewers, stations and sponsors.

Taking note of lavish displays planned for the National Assn. of Television Program Executives convention in January by Walt Disney Domestic Television, King World, LBS Communications and other syndicators, Mr. Koch said his company will avoid flashy presentations because "it cuts into the bottom line."

Syndicast began 17 years ago as the CPM Programs subsidiary of Norman, Craig & Kummel, at a time when barter was looked down upon.

It lacks the deep pockets of a Grey Advertising (LBS Communications' parent), Lorimar Inc. (which just joined forces with Telepictures Corp.) or the several companies backing TeleRep's Operation Prime Time, he said. Thus, Syndicast pays close attention to syndication history and the economics of the business.

A look at the initial Nielsen ratings for this fall's first-run syndication crop would seem to support Mr. Koch's cautious approach to syndicated series.

Even such costly series as Paramount's "America" and the LBS Communications/Tribune Entertainment/Columbia Pictures TV "Inday" co-venture, each with production budgets well into eight digits, have been faring poorly. (Tribune Broadcasting, Chicago, already has cut the Inday daytime programing block in half by axing two of the four half-hour series, while "America" is undergoing on-air changes.)

Still, it is very difficult to make money on specials alone.

A two-hour bartered special can cost upward of $250,000 to produce, but can generate about $500,000—before expenses, commissions, promotion, make-goods and the like.

Perhaps with that in mind, Mr. Koch indicated that some of Syndicast's future specials have series potential.

The most imminent is "1985 R&B Countdown," produced by Bob Banner Associates for a Dec. 31 to Jan. 31 tv "window." That two-hour special, featuring singers Kool & the Gang and Whitney Houston as hosts and offering videos of the year's top 30 rhythm & blues hits (including USA for Africa's "We Are the World"), will in effect be a series pilot, Mr. Koch said.

In addition, Syndicast (which is handling sponsor sales for several music series from On The Air, including "TV 2000" and "Lovesongs") is scrutinizing the series prospects for seven other projects of its own, for late-night, weekend sports time and children's and adult daytime slots. Mr. Koch said the sports show is a new version of "Sports Challenge," one of the first series Syndicast bartered (as CPM, for Colgate-Palmolive). A daytime series also is possible, he said, despite Syndicast's two failed tries at mounting a game-show block as an alternative to the Big 3 networks' soap operas.

For children, two animated projects are being considered for Monday-through-Friday stripping for fall '86, he said. (Already, Telepictures is selling "Silver Hawks" and three partners are pitching "Galaxy Rangers," both for fall '86, while LBS Communications is promoting "Kideo TV" as a cartoon series bloc for spring '86.)

Syndicast has just renewed "Terrahawks," a science-fiction children's series featuring puppets rather than animation, for 1986-87. It plans to take "Kidsworld," the 10-year-old Behrens Co.-produced live-action series, from a weekly show to a daily strip next season. Coleco Industries, the weekly's major sponsor, has first rights on this strip, Mr. Koch noted. A "Raccoons" cartoon series is yet another contender for fall '86, using 11 episodes that have run on the Disney Channel; there also are two previously done specials, "The Christmas Raccoons," sold mainly to Coleco and Tonka Corp., for next month, and "Raccoons on Ice," due in the '86 first quarter.

Other specials due within the first two quarters of '86 include the "1986 Golden Globe Awards," a two-hour show to air live on the West Coast (a first) on Jan. 24 and go tape-delayed to scores of other markets the next evening; "Lou Rawls Presents the Third Annual Black Gold Awards," due in March as a two-hour Dick Clark-produced event, renewed by Anheuser-Busch; "Where Do We Go from Here?" starring Shirley MacLaine; "Perry Como's Easter Special," and three half-hour specials picked up by the CBS-owned outlets, "Countdown to the Super Bowl" in January, "A Look at Grammy" in February and "A Look at the Academy Awards" in March. The "1986 Mrs. America Pageant" is due live in August.

Among Syndicast's offnet shows, "The Woman Who Willed a Miracle," an ex-ABC "Afterschool Special" drama hour due for March/April, has inspired so much station interest that Mr. Koch now is trying to find more "heartwarming dramas" to form a monthly afterschool package, starting as soon as summer, 1986.

Other offnet fare includes "Return to Iwo Jima" and "The Unknown Soldier," two ex-Public Broadcasting Service documentaries due around Memorial Day '86 as a two-hour back-to-back special, and "The Demon Murder Case," a tv movie slated for next Halloween.

Two offnet Elvis Presley specials also are in the 1986-87 package: "Aloha from Hawaii," (ex-NBC), due in January on more than 160 stations, and "One Night with You," newly added for January '87. The latter is a Home Box Office hour including outtakes from a 1968 NBC special. Both shows are being sold on a cash/barter basis for three plays across two years; the first play will be barter, the others cash.

Offnet series are another story. The more popular ones command such high prices that only the well-heeled can acquire the syndie rights, sources said, pointing to Telepictures being unable, at $80 million, to outbid Columbia Pictures TV on "Hardcastle & McCormick" and "Riptide." As for the short-lived series, Mr. Koch said those "simply don't have the legs to gamble on in syndication" and their quick axings have tarred them with a negative image among stations, sponsors and even viewers.

Coke

tween the two sister shops, despite talk of "linkage."

"We are competing agencies. The only thing we have in common is a mutual client," said William Weithas, chairman of SSC&B:Lintas Worldwide.

Coca-Cola hints at an attempt to hang onto some sort of umbrella by stating that it also has assigned to McCann any institutional advertising that deals with the Coke-Cola megabrand—the language it uses to describe its multiple products bearing the Coke name.

Ad investment unclear

But with Classic now pitted against new Coke, and Tab again destined to meet rival Diet Coke head-on, just how much the company would be investing in umbrella advertising was unclear.

Mr. Dyson, in talking to financial analysts, termed the new approach "linkage." He said "co-portrayal permits us to present these two products as a team to differentiate their basic characteristics and exclude all others from the dialog. We will be considering that same umbrella approach together with separate and dedicated positions."

But this idea for two separate campaigns turned out to be a rehash of an earlier idea. An internal company memo that surfaced recently suggested that as early as last summer, before Classic went national, some executives feared that new Coke would not survive, especially if it lacked a separate identity (AA, Nov. 4).

If this change in strategy from the megabrand approach to two competing brands is a last-ditch effort to save a dying new Coke brand, as some suggest, the move already may be too late.

On learning of the moves, some bottlers questioned whether they could transfer ad dollars designated in their markets for new Coke to the better-selling Coke Classic. If such thinking spreads among bottlers, the future of new Coke's promotional support would be in doubt.

Everything that has occurred in the saga since the company made its shocking announcement in April that the old product would be replaced with a new and improved flavor has resulted in uncertainty.

Reeling from a public outcry approaching outrage against that move, Coca-Cola brought back the original flavor under the name Coca-Cola Classic six weeks later.

Confident that its research proved that it was simply a matter of time before the new flavor outsold the original, the company maintained initially that the new flavor would be the flagship brand and that Classic would be available but not supported with any significant marketing budget.

Thus there was no need for a new or different ad agency, Coca-Cola said.

Gave way to megabrand plan

That position quickly gave way to the megabrand approach and advertising showing Classic and new Coke alternately in the same tv commercials by McCann, the Coke agency since 1955.

Whether McCann came out a winner in retaining new Coke is a matter of debate even among those within Interpublic.

Some believe Classic will get up to 80% of the total budget for the two colas, which this year was about $100 million. Others say the split is more like 50-50.

Curvin O'Rielly, McCann executive creative director, said, "it doesn't make sense" not to spend behind new Coke, because the brand "needs help."

The assignment represents a big win for Interpublic Group of Cos. It reconfirms Coca-Cola's faith in that agency network and is considered a coup for Interpublic chairman Philip Geier, who earlier this year had to worry about the outcome of meetings of Coca-Cola marketing executives with other New York agencies.

The shift also includes the move of Ramblin' root beer from Kenyon & Eckhardt to Marschalk Co., eliminating K&E from the company's roster. Spending on Ramblin' last year was $100,000.

Marschalk also was assigned Fresca diet citrus, a $2.6 million brand, and Mello Yello low-carbonated drink, with spending less than $1 million. Those brands came from McDonald & Little, an Atlanta agency that parent Ted Bates Advertising closed down a week ago (AA, Nov. 11).

Both McCann and SSC&B were pleased with the outcome of the review—McCann because it got an emerging brand in Cherry Coke, even though it lost Classic—and SSC&B because it was assigned the biggest jewel in the crown, Classic.

"We're delirious," said McCann's Mr. O'Rielly. "But we expected to come out as winners."

SSC&B's Mr. Weithas commented, "We're absolutely delighted. Coca-Cola Classic is one of the great brands in the world. . .I feel very good about the confidence Coca-Cola has placed in us."

Although not happy about losing Cherry Coke, he said he is very proud of the agency's work: "It goes to McCann in great shape. I hope they can move it to even greater heights. The same thing is true with Tab. I'm very proud of that."

McCann is pinning its hopes on establishing the underdog as the Coke of the future, the "upstart brand, a fighter meeting competition head-on, seeking a new consumer."

If all goes as planned, Classic will appeal to an older consumer, those who drink the brand not only for the taste but for the nostalgia associated with it.

Mr. Dyson has positioned Classic as a brand that gains from the imagery that reflects strong choice and preference.

The brand, he added, "has caused a lot of people to step forward and say 'This is my soft drink.' The number of people who are exclusive or dominant consumers of our product has increased considerably. The basic positioning of [new] Coke is to go after all other cola consumers. The source of business is obviously our competitors and new consumers."

But bottlers are not yet convinced. An advertising executive at one major Coca-Cola bottler said the move opens the door to several opportunities. He and other bottlers are awaiting word on exactly how the co-op advertising programs will work.

Presumably, there will be two different programs because the products will be positioned separately by their separate agencies. If, as the bottlers hope, dollars designated for new Coke can be transferred to Classic, many bottlers would opt for that, thereby reducing new Coke's promotional underpinnings.

Looking to the not-too-distant future, the bottler ad executive said he could foresee a time when bottlers would ask Atlanta to eliminate their markets from any market buys for new Coke.

Continues to struggle

New Coke continues to struggle in the marketplace as Classic outsells it nationally 3 to 1. But the company points out that its total share of the sugar cola market now is greater with the two brands than it was before new Coke arrived.

Mr. O'Rielly said his agency plans to do some consumer research before selecting an approach. "We've got a number of campaigns, any of which could do the job," he said. "That was very easy for us."

Both of these efforts are expected to be ready to air soon after the first of the year.

As for Tab, it represents another about-face as the company returns the diet cola to McCann after a 17-month stay at SSC&B. When the soft drink was moved to SSC&B, the Diet Coke shop, the company said it had to parallel an internal organizational move concerning its growing sugar-free category.#

Agency financial results

The third quarter was a poor one as far as net income was concerned. With the exception of Interpublic and Ogilvy, all of the public agencies were down in earnings. NM means not meaningful. Source: Advertising Age.

Agencies

Co., New York. "But the top-line growth was not so bad, given the difficulty of surpassing last year's Olympics spending."

Net-income declines generally indicate that agencies set expenses for a level of revenue growth that didn't materialize, Mr. Crane added.

Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, predicts its "full-year 1985 U.S. revenues will climb no more than 4% to 5%, rather than the 8%-to-10% increase we had expected earlier," said president Norman Brown.

He also announced the agency was introducing a new budgetary system to improve its reaction time to revenue declines.

"Widespread decreases or postponements of client spending this year made it evident that our former budget system did not give us adequate warning to permit timely adjustment of our cost structure in all instances," he said.

FCB, which suffered the results of an "accelerated" slowdown in client ad spending in the third quarter, was one of the agencies doing most poorly; net income dropped 61.2%.

One explanation was the completion of the consolidation of its 1984 acquisition of the NCK Organization.

"We've now solved every problem we know of," said Mr. Brown, who added the agency had "set a goal of not rolling over any problems into 1986."

Looking back over the last 18 months and the "immense task" of consolidating the two agencies in 14 European countries, merging some and closing other offices, Mr. Brown said it had taken "twice the time and twice the money" that he planned but that he hoped "all of that is cleaned up and behind us."

DDB, which lost $651,000 in the third quarter of 1984, lost $671,000 this year.

Mickelberry, which earned $528,000 in the third quarter of 1984, fell $59,000 into the red with this year's third quarter, reflecting, said chairman James Marlas, "a decline in the operating contribution from the advertising segment of our business, which has been restructuring after the loss of some clients."

Ally was down 35.1% in net income, reflecting primarily the departure of Travelers Insurance, which spent heavily in last year's third quarter. The agency's fiscal year begins July 1, though figures in the chart were adjusted to allow a nine-month comparison for this year.

BBDO explained its 88% decline in earnings by noting "the loss from the transfer of ownership of the South African operation to local management," a development that the agency had announced this past summer.

JWT Group, New York, reported record third-quarter revenues, up 8.6% from last year's comparable period, but an 8.3% decline in net income.

Although J. Walter Thompson Co. and Hill & Knowlton turned in "excellent profit performances," said chairman Don Johnston, the decreases stemmed over-all from increased investment spending in new-business development, expansion into new markets and worldwide tax planning, as well as specifically "lower contributions from Thompson Recruitment Advertising and Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein."#

FCC giving a break to CapCities, Murdoch

By STEVEN W. COLFORD

WASHINGTON—In approving $5.5 billion worth of media acquisitions in less than two hours, the Federal Communications Commission last week did more than make Rupert Murdoch happy.

The commission also unanimously waived long-standing rules on cross-ownership and multiple ownership.

FCC's approval of Capital Cities Communications' $3.5 billion purchase of American Broadcasting Cos. meant abandoning its rule against common ownership of broadcast stations in overlapping markets.

As a result, CapCities gets to keep both WABC-TV, New York, and WPVI-TV, Philadelphia, while agreeing to put studio facilities in two nearby cities, Trenton, N.J., and Wilmington, Del., which is in a state with no commercial vhf station, and news bureaus in Atlantic City and Harrisburg, Pa.

For Mr. Murdoch's $2 billion buy of six Metromedia radio and tv stations, the FCC granted his News America company two years, six months longer than normal, in which to dispose of the money-losing New York Post and the marginally profitable Chicago Sun-Times.

Mr. Murdoch has indicated an interest in trying to retain both the papers and the tv stations permanently, according to the waiver denial petition filed by the Media Access Project, a coalition of consumer and interest groups.

Asked after the FCC decision whether Mr. Murdoch might use the two-year breather to try to retain the newspapers, his spokesman, Howard Rubenstein, said, "Mr. Murdoch hasn't discussed that."#

Saatchi to buy U.K. agency

By LAUREL WENTZ

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi is expected to announce today the purchase of Grandfield Rork Collins, a local shop that until recently was allied with Ally & Gargano, New York, to serve the Federal Express account internationally.

In addition to acquiring a $98 million agency group—Saatchi's largest U.K. ad agency buy since purchasing Dorland Advertising four years ago—the deal will give Saatchi access to the lucrative U.K. public relations market for the first time through two GRC-owned pr shops. The lack of a U.K. pr operation has been a gap in Saatchi's worldwide empire.

Granard Communications, ranked 16th in size among U.K. pr agencies, had fee income of $2.1 million for the fiscal year ending in September, 1984. GRC Financial, which specializes in financial services, is No. 28 and reported fee income of $1 million for the year ending June 30.

Saatchi also is negotiating to buy Kingsway PR, ranked ninth in the U.K. with fee income of $2 million for fiscal 1984. Sources here say Saatchi might announce the acquisition of Kingsway at the same time or shortly after an announcement about GRC is made.

If both GRC and Kingsway are acquired, Saatchi will become one of the leading pr forces in the U.K. overnight. The Saatchi group already is the 10th-largest pr group in the U.S., following the acquisition of New York-based Rowland Co. in February.#

It's a wonderful life

Gordon Bowen is a firm follower of the "everything is wonderful" faith. The advertising industry is wonderful. New York City, where he now lives, is wonderful. Salt Lake City, where he used to live, is wonderful. His new job, as executive creative director of Ogilvy & Mather Partners, is wonderful. His old agency, Bonneville Media Communications, is wonderful. The group of Bonneville writers he brought with him to New York is wonderful. And if asked, he would no doubt eagerly point out that Mormonism, his adopted religion, is also wonderful. Not that you could ever accuse Gordon Bowen of insincerity. Far from it. He clearly believes everything he says. This zeal is precisely what O&M Partners is looking for. See Page 4.

Botway/Libov dismisses 40

NEW YORK—Botway/Libov Associates has dismissed or given notice to more than 40 staffers in the wake of losing the Toys "R" Us spot tv-buying duties to the newly formed Bohbot & Cohn (AA, Nov. 18). "Some have left, some will leave at year's end and some in 1986," says Botway/Libov president Ave Butensky. Toys "R" Us, Rochelle Park, N.J., was the agency's first account when Ed Libov Associates began about 20 years ago.

Shearson calls for pitch

NEW YORK—Shearson Lehman Brothers has offered two unidentified Interpublic agencies the chance to pitch for its $20 million account, now at McCann-Erickson, another Interpublic shop. A decision on whether to throw open the review to other agencies was expected by Nov. 22.

Mac ad features 'Fridge'

OAK BROOK, ILL.—McDonald's Corp. this week filmed a tv spot that includes Chicago Bears lineman/running back/budding cult hero William (The Refrigerator) Perry. The commercial is expected to break on the networks during the first week of December. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, is McDonald's agency. Also, Mr. Perry will team with Bears quarterback Jim McMahon in a tv commercial for Coke and Coca-Cola Classic that will air in December on a market-by-market basis. SSC&B, New York, is creating the spot for Atlanta-based Coca-Cola Co. Separately, Snapple Beverage Co., Ridgewood, N.Y., will use ex-Pittsburgh Steeler Franco Harris in a tv spot for its new wild cranberry and chocolate all-natural sodas. The company says the soft drinks will be national by March, from their current market east of the Mississippi. Ads are handled in-house.

No Saturn shop till '87

DETROIT—General Motors Corp.'s Saturn unit won't pick an agency for another two years, says Saturn president William Hoglund. He added that the new car will not reach the market before calendar 1989. GM executives' optimistic forecasts earlier had placed the Saturn's debut as early as fall, 1987, with an agency selection to be made as early as this year (AA, July 8). The Saturn account could top $100 million by the early 1990s.

BMW backs used cars

MONTVALE, N.J.—BMW of North America is about to become the only U.S. auto marketer to offer a factory-backed used-car warranty. The national program is designed to bolster used-BMW prices and strengthen dealers. A heavy introductory campaign breaks in February, billing BMW as "the only auto maker that stands behind its cars. Twice." Ammirati & Puris, New York, handles the print and tv effort.

Edison lights at Doner

WASHINGTON—Edison Electric Institute, a consortium of electric utilities, has handed its $5.5 million account to W.B. Doner & Co., Baltimore. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, previously had the account. Ketchum Advertising (Continued on Page 55)

Q&Adgraphs

The question: What effect will the stand-alone 15-second tv spot have on the effectiveness of creativity in commercials and the efficiency of tv commercial buys?

N. HARRISON

Neil Harrison, senior vp-media director, Weightman Advertising, Philadelphia: Several of our advertisers will now start to have either a 70/30 split or a 60/40 split between 30s and 15s. However, if there is greater use of these (shorter) units, recall may diminish. And if demand for (the 15s) increases, so will the price. . .If cost advantages of stand-alone 15s continue to be favorable—that is, half the cost of a 30—then we will convert 30% to 35%. . .into 15s. That will generate higher reach and frequency, or we can extend a four-week flight into five weeks.

D. KIERNAN

Dick Kiernan, exec vp-creative services, Grey Advertising, New York: For many package-goods products, it's going to be the most effective and efficient way to sell on tv, but for many products and services that depend a great deal on emotional content it will be a fight to see if they can do it in a 15-second commercial. . .I don't think it will become the standard unit in the way the 30-second commercial replaced the 60 because, taking an example from another agency, I don't think you can do a commercial like "I want to buy the world a Coke" in 15 seconds.

L. SUGARMAN

Len Sugarman, exec vp-executive creative director, Foote, Cone & Belding, New York: It will be a challenge to the effectiveness in that it will add to clutter. Also, if American advertising continues to test 15-second commercials in the way it tests 30-second commercials—that is, on whether the rational benefit of why to buy the product is getting across—then the emotional content will suffer. In a 30-second commercial, you can get that rational message across as well as the subtler message. With a 15-second commercial, emotion will be the first thing to go.

P. BENJOU

Paul Benjou, senior vp-director of marketing planning, media and administration, Doyle Graf Mabley, New York: One of the changes in the planning process will be frequency, which will become more important. Shorter commercials will have less impact. Positioning within the commercial pod will also become more important. In pricing, a buy will. . .look more efficient on paper, but what will disappear is not yet known. More research has to be done. For example, 10s are good adjuncts to 30s, but not as stand-alones.

E. WEBER

Eric Weber, exec vp-creative director, Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York: I don't think that it will diminish or add to the effectiveness of tv advertising. Advertising is already becoming more billboard or poster-like, and I like that. I think tv advertising will continue to be the most powerful advertising of all time and advertisers will find brilliant ways to use television advertising in 15 seconds. The people who do it well will continue to have effective advertising, and those who don't do it well will not have effective advertising. ■

Juggling continues despite welcomed disinflation

By Robert J. Coen

Breaks in some media pricing practices are long overdue. In 1982, double-digit inflation in the U.S. economy began to moderate, but media inflation continued at close to double-digit levels. The relative differential between media inflation and total inflation has widened sharply since then.

Media disinflation is inevitable; and in 1986, buyers in time and space can expect a softening in rates across the board. Network tv prices, up 8% in 1985, will increase only 6%; spot tv, up 6% in 1985, will increase 5.5% in unit prices; spot and network radio, up 6% and 8% in 1985, will rise 5.5% and 6%, respectively; newspaper rates, up 8% in 1985, will climb 7%; magazine rates grew 7% in 1985, but will rise only 5.5%; outdoor will remain the same at a 6% increase, and direct mail will rise 4% in prices compared with 7% in 1985.

There have been a number of nonrecurring developments the past several years that have staved off the de-escalation in prices up to the middle of this year.

The traditional lag between media price changes and other price changes kept rates up through 1982 when other prices began to break. In 1983, the economy expanded sharply and new products and extra ad demand held off media disinflation for another year. The long-awaited appearance did not arrive in 1984 because of the Olympics and the general election. After nearly double-digit increases in media unit prices in 1982, 1983 and 1984, the rate dropped to 7% in 1985 and in 1986 price increases for most media are expected to be about 5% to 6%.

In 1986 price increases for most media are expected to be about 5% to 6%.

A better understanding of the likely price trends may be gained by a review of past trends.

There is a direct correlation between media inflation and general inflation in our economy. However, as the economy's structure changes with shifts in technology and society, there are underlying modifications in the basic role of advertising.

During the past quarter of a century, there were four intervals in which shifts in the basic demand relationship occurred. These were:

The 1960s opened with great expectations for the advertising industry. Tv had fueled exceptional growth after the end of World War II, and the momentum carried over into what was expected to be the soaring '60s.

Tv audiences grew much faster than the population, and the medium began the transition from black and white to color. Fueled by growing demand and the optimism of the Great Society years, the media aggressively expanded their audiences and circulations, and media unit prices rose more rapidly than the consumer price index.

During this time, the CPI rose from 89 to 100 (base year 1967 equals 100), a gain of 12%, while the price index of all media units rose from 78 to 100, a relative increase of 28%. But when adjusted for audience and circulation gains, the increase was 18%, much more in line with the CPI increase. Unit increases for tv and magazines were much higher, but so were the audience and circulation gains. Costs per thousand did not far outstrip the CPI as they have recently.

In the closing years of the period, rising costs had a noticeable effect on buyer demand. By 1967 inflation was picking up steam and approaching the then-considered dangerous levels of 3% to 4%. The rapid runup in media costs, despite the accompanying audience gains, was causing some schedule cutbacks.

During these years the soaring absolute cost of 60-second commercials caused the cutback to 30-second spots as the standard. A plateau in budgets and a shift in advertising tactics resulted as unit cost increases exceeded the limits of affordability.

Then a new media pricing interval appeared on the scene near the end of the decade.

The media supply and demand relationship shifted dramatically during the next media interval. The supply of available units was expanded because of the cutback in commercial length and the disappearance of cigaret advertisers from the broadcast media. The imbalance in the relationship was extended for a number of years because of energy shortages, artificial price control restraints, Watergate and a long recession.

From 1967 to 1975, the CPI went from 100 to 161, a 61% gain, while the unit price index of all media rose to 163, a 63% gain influenced by the exceptional increase in mail advertising costs caused by the more than doubling of postal rates.

The composite index for national media budgets, excluding mail, rose to only 146, a significantly smaller increase than the CPI, and when adjusted for audience and circulation gains, a mere 27% increase was the experience of most major national advertisers.

This second media interval was characterized by a slowdown in media prices in relation to all other prices. There was a break in the media price runups from 1967 to 1975 when a series of developments—Arab oil embargo, Watergate, wage and price controls, banning of cigarets from tv—restricted the normal growth in advertising demand. This period ended when the economy turned back upward in the second half of 1975.

By mid-1975 the economy was

picking up steam and the excess supply of media inventory was diminishing. New products and new marketers appeared and took up some of the slack. The tv networks and stations had unleashed aggressive sales efforts to uncover new customers when they lost their cigaret business at the same time that 30-second spots were expanding the supply of commercial time.

During the previous period, many magazines reduced circulation, and print availabilities were contracted further by the demise of large circulation photo journalism magazines such as Life and Look. During these years magazines held down their ad rate increases while raising subscription and newsstand prices sharply. By 1975 the added cigaret advertising demand and the reduced mass magazine supply contributed to an upsurge in demand and cost of magazine space.

In 1976, an election year, the U.S. bicentennial, an Olympic year and a year of strong economic recovery, the pentup demand for ad time and space exploded and a sharp upward turn in media pricing began.

From 1975 to 1981 the CPI rose from 161 to 272, an increase of 69%, but media unit prices soared even higher. Network tv and spot tv prices about doubled, and other media rates matched or exceeded the CPI growth with the exception of the mail. By 1981 a closer relationship between media price increases and general price increases appeared to be imminent, just about the time the U.S. disinflationary trend got under way. Instead, the spread between media price increases and other increases got wider.

In 1981 the war against U.S. inflation began to take hold, and disinflation started about midyear. In 1982, the increase in consumer prices had descended from double-digit rates to a more acceptable 6.2%. The rate has been 4% in 1983, 1984 and 1985. From 1981 to 1985 total U.S. consumer prices rose a relatively modest 18% and the price of food, apparel and new cars rose only about 10%.

On the other hand, media disinflation is just now beginning to get started, having been held off by exceptionally strong demand, the Olympics and a traditional time lag.

The index of media unit costs for national advertisers rose from 271 in 1981—compared with 272 for the CPI—to a 1985 index of 383, considerably higher than the CPI of 322. Media unit costs, on average, have risen 41% over these years when most marketers have not been able to impose increases on the price of their own goods and services of much more than 10%.

The resistance to soaring media costs has become even stronger because none of the media has accompanied these price hikes with any significant audience or circulation increases. In fact, most tv network audiences have declined.

The advertising and marketing industry has come to a point when media price breaks appear inevitable. A new trend in media pricing has begun.

Media disinflation began in earnest this year and the outlook is for the size of media price changes to come more in line with those of most other items. The latest pricing trends are as follows:

Network tv

For more than a decade, network tv price increases have been far above general price inflation, but since midyear, network buyer demand has been softening. Many established brands no longer can afford the escalated price of prime-time, 30-second commercials, and budgets are being redirected to less costly dayparts or barter syndication. New product introductions have slowed and new network buyers have failed to appear as the economic expansion has lost steam.

Average network unit prices rose 10.7% in 1982, 8% in 1983, and in 1984 the average, excluding the Olympics, went up 10.5%. But in 1985, the networks' seller's market is eroding. Reports on the upfront market indicate reduced commitments and a significant moderation in price increases.

Many scatter prices in the closing months of the summer and into the fourth quarter dropped. Reports of exceptional opportunistic buys are proliferating. In 1985, the three-network revenue total is not expected to be much higher, if at all higher, than the 1984 level.

Although a major explanation is the absence of the Olympics, this is the slowest growth in a post-Olympic year for decades. Prices for many regular network programs are now flat and ratings often are down. The size of unit price increases is less than in the past, but lower ratings push up some cpms.

In 1986 the moderating trend will continue and the shift to 15-second commercials will bring more disruption. Eventually, the tv networks will complete the transition from 30s to 15s and pricing will become firmer. However, in 1986 much lower rate increases and, in a number of dayparts, some actual rollback on prices are expected. But, on average, network tv unit prices are expected to go up 6% in 1986.

Instead of soldout networks contributing to extra demand for other media, there may be a reverse trend resulting from more moderately priced network units now that 15s are available.

Spot tv

In the past decade, spot tv often has received dollars because of soldout network situations. New product introductions, rebate advertising and growth in retailer usage all have contributed to the high price increases.

The economy has slowed and so has the number of new product introductions and total advertising demand. The expansion in availabilities because of the arrival of the 15-second commercial and the growth in independent station inventory will speed up spot disinflation.

In many markets and dayparts, spot prices easily could fall below year-earlier levels as demand wavers and networks become real competitors instead of a source of pass-along business.

In 1986 the average increase in spot tv unit prices is expected to be quite modest compared with 1985. Unit prices will be up about 5.5%, but there will be more stations sharing the viewing. The resulting slight rating losses could offset the population gain, making cpms about 5.5% higher next year as well.

Radio

There are many more radio stations competing for ad dollars in a market than tv stations. Some radio stations are able to increase rates without losing advertising orders if the strength of their station improves noticeably. But when the economy is not robust and prices in competing media are soft, most radio stations are forced to keep rate hikes to a minimum.

In 1986 spot radio rates are expected to rise slower than most media. Spot radio rates should rise 5.5% with the radio networks getting a slightly higher 6% increase.

Newspapers

Newspapers receive most of their ad revenue from local advertisers. Retailers are their most important customers, but newspapers' most profitable business comes from classified real estate and employment ads. In 1985 the classified linage held up, but retail linage was soft. Many key local advertisers shifted to heavier insert programs and use of the mail.

Until this year, newspapers in many markets enjoyed near monopoly conditions and ad rates rose sharply in most years. Now the newspapers are experiencing conditions quite similar to those of the tv networks. The soft ecoromy and the recent runup in ad rates is threatening to drive customers to other alternatives such as the mail or broadcast media.

Newspapers will continue to raise rates as much as seems prudent, but for the near future they are likely to hold back on the size of their annual increases, with papers in many markets turning to the readers for a larger share of their revenue requirements. On average, unit rates are expected to rise about 7% in 1986 with little change in circulation, so cpms also will be up about 7%.

Magazines

Competition among magazines for advertising orders always has been very strong. However, until this year, the demand for magazine space has been good and price competition has not been as intense as it was in the 1967-1975 period.

In 1985 magazine page volume began to decline, and now price competition is becoming fierce again. Some publications have begun to make deals or provide extras to get the order. Others have revised rate cards downward while dropping circulation guarantees. Average page rates are expected to go up 5.5% with a slight over-all drop in circulation for a cpm increase of 6% in 1986.

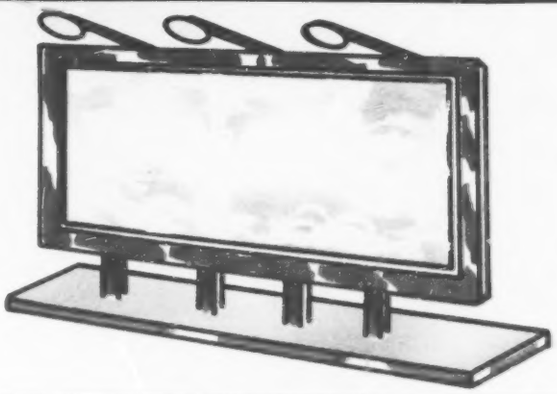
Outdoor

Cigaret and liquor advertisers have depended heavily on the outdoor medium to display their products, which are not generally acceptable in the broadcast media. This strong source of demand enabled the outdoor plant operators to command high annual price increases in recent years for their somewhat restricted supply of outdoor boards.

Cigaret and liquor sales to consumers have reached a plateau and new brand introductions have been drying up. The softening demand for outdoor space is expected to keep price increases to about 6% in 1986.

Direct mail

In the past few years, the direct mail medium has been able to hold down price increases. This has been partially because of economies in managing production expenses such as list development, paper grades, piece size and the costs of mechanically preparing the pieces for mailing. Costs also have been held down because of special postal presort discounts, which have resulted in only a slight upswing in postage costs in recent years.



In February, the U.S. Postal Service raised the third-class postal rate about 14%, but economies in production design and execution kept cost increases to a minimum, so total 1985 cost increases averaged about 7%. In 1986 there will be no further postage increases, but new economies of scale in the production portion of costs will be difficult to come by. However, the overall cost increase for mail advertising should be a relatively modest 4%.

Moderation or media disinflation began early this year and it will be firmly in place in 1986. Media prices are expected to continue to come more into agreement with other price changes after years at much higher levels.

The average annual price changes of most major media were twice the size of general inflation in 1982, 1983 and 1984. For example, the cost of a 30-second network tv commercial rose 11% in 1982 when the CPI rise had moderated to 6.1%. In 1983 network tv prices rose again by 8% despite a general inflation rate of only 3.2%. Then in Olympic year 1984, even the regular network commercials leaped upward 13%. All media price rises were far in excess of the 4.3% rise in the CPI in 1984, but in 1985 moderation finally set in.

This year, when the CPI is running at less than 4%, prices for major media, both on a unit and cpm basis, still are running at least double the CPI rate.

In 1986, when consumer prices are expected to rise about 4%, most major media price increases will cluster between 5% and 6%. For the rest of this decade, media inflation and total inflation should move closer together. Between 1985 and 1990 consumer prices probably will rise by less than 25%. By 1990 most media schedules will go up in price by a little more than 25%, but probably not much more than 30%.

Media price increases the next few years are likely to be a shade higher than most price increases, but the differential between cpms and the CPI will be far smaller than it has been in the past.

Communications industry's financial score soars

John S. Suhler is president of Veronis, Suhler & Associates, a New York investment banking company specializing in communications industry mergers and acquisitions. David C. Lamb is an associate in the company and editor of VS&A's annual "Communications Industry Report," the third edition of which will be published next month. Information in this article is taken from that report.

By John S. Suhler and David C. Lamb

The communications industry found itself at center stage in 1985, as a wave of corporate mergers attracted both Wall Street and popular attention. The industry's attractiveness is obvious when viewing its financial performance for the past five years.

Veronis, Suhler & Associates defines the communications industry as those businesses involved in the creation or distribution of intellectual property. Based on VS&A's examination of 1984 data for 279 business lines of 256 companies, the communications industry is a $60 billion business, up from $50 billion in last year's analysis. This figure includes only the publicly held or publicly reporting companies engaged in communications.

Various subsectors of the communications industry commonly are recognized as the media, the information industry and the entertainment business. Another way of organizing the industry, is to examine the four predominantly advertiser-supported segments—broadcasting, newspaper publishing, business magazine publishing and consumer magazine publishing—in contrast to the five segments that do not depend primarily on advertiser support. The "advertiser-independent" segments are cable and pay tv, business information services, book publishing, entertainment programing and distribution, and recorded music.

The wild card in this scheme is the ad agency business itself. VS&A has analyzed it both as an advertiser-supported segment—a characterization no agency head would refute—and as an ad-independent segment.

The advertising-supported segments of the communications industry, including agencies, accounted for about half of the communications industry's revenue in 1984. They contributed closer to 60% of industry operating income.

Looked at from the standpoint of advertising dependent vs. independent sectors, the ad-supported sector in 1984 appears as the healthier piece of a vigorous industry.

The ad-supported sector's revenue (minus agencies) increased 16.2% in 1984 over 1983; this result compares favorably with the over-all communications industry's growth of 15.7%. Furthermore, pretax operating income for this group grew 22.3% in 1984. The gain outpaced communications industry growth, a very respectable 19.7%. Few $60 billion industries increase pretax income at this velocity.

The contrast between the ad-supported sector and the ad-independent sector is more pronounced than the contrast between the ad-supported sector and the communications industry. Last year, the ad-supported sector (again minus agencies) increased revenue 7% faster and pretax income 26% faster than the ad-independent sector.

The ad-supported portion also boasts higher operating and cash flow margins than either the

Buying

GM's network specials and miniseries.

General Motors was the third largest network tv advertiser in 1984, spending $231 million.

Each agency also was given buying responsibilities for a group of magazines, and reportedly each magazine has been asked to propose discount structures for multiyear contracts. GM spent $96 million on magazines in 1984.

Although Ms. Patrick declines to discuss specifics about GM, she says a lack of equilibrium in the marketplace is forcing advertisers to re-evaluate some basic concepts about media.

"Cable tv, specialty magazines among other media have upset things. As more households get vcrs and are able to do their own programing, fundamental change and a lot of instability is developing in the marketplace," she says. "We need to understand what's going on. Is this a threat to the traditional advertising vehicles? A big part of the problem is that consumers themselves don't know."

One effect of this uncertainty is a willingness of advertisers to experiment with new media, paying closer attention to value—the reach and frequency of impression on the medium's natural audience. "Advertisers are placing fewer volume media buys, such as network tv. They're spreading the money around trying different approaches," Ms. Patrick says.

Philip Guarascio, executive director-advertising services for GM, says corporations are looking for ways to get a bigger voice in the marketplace through emerging media. By getting in on the ground floor, an advertiser can benefit later.

"Clients providing seed money tend to get substantial financial benefits later on. "You win biggest when you take some risks," Mr. Guarascio says.

The overriding factors at GM are efficiency and effectiveness of media buying for each division, Mr. Guarascio says. In this regard, consolidating spending gives an advertiser "more bang for the buck." He notes a trend toward "massification" of ad spending, either in-house or through a lead agency, to gain leverage in media buying.

"Generally, the more dollars you spend, the better position you have in the marketplace. Finding ways to bundle spending is the most important thing," he says.

The same is true of AT&T, which realigned network buying assignments effective last Jan. 1 to make lead agencies responsible for dayparts rather than for products and services. This eliminated instances where AT&T agencies would bid against each other for the same tv shows, artificially raising the demand and price of network time, says Bob Watson, AT&T corporate media director.

"We were bidding against each other. Each agency was doing its own thing in its own way, and it wasn't even coordinated so that we weren't running into each other," Mr. Watson says. The realignment "put some sanity back into the process."

Since the change, improvements in network tv buying may save AT&T 5% on network spending in 1985, Mr. Watson says. AT&T spent $253 million in measured network tv during 1984, but is expected to spend much less in 1985, he says. Spending in 1984 was higher because of "equal access" advertising and introductions of AT&T personal computers.

AT&T is attempting to strike a balance between centralized and decentralized media planning, Mr. Watson says. After divestiture of the seven regional holding companies Jan. 1, 1984, AT&T exercised its new marketing freedom with an uncoordinated, decentralized ad program that generated as many as 14 different theme lines, he says.

With the relaxation of certain federal regulations concerning its information systems and communications divisions, the company is moving back to a more centralized system of planning, he says.

"If we're to act as a unified corporation, we have to work together and promote one theme line: 'AT&T, the right choice,'" Mr. Watson says. "That is no easy task in a company this size. It's kind of like trying to control a runaway freight train."

Possibly a key factor in reevaluation of media buying strategy is the long-term shift in the cost efficiencies of specific media elements. The past decade, 1976-85, has witnessed a dramatic upward trend in both inflation and in media costs per thousand, "making it a very difficult 10-year period for advertisers," says Fred Brandt, vp-media information and analysis at Ted Bates Advertising/New York.

Some media have become relatively more expensive than others. Evening network tv prices have increased 13.4% on a compounded annual basis since 1976, nearly double the consumer price index compound annual growth rate of 7.4%. Magazines have increased 9.1% annually in the same period, and most other media have increased annually in the 9% to 10% range. Exceptions are spot tv and spot radio, which are bargains at 6.7% and 6.5% increases, respectively, he says.

These shifts in cpm mandate continuing advertiser re-evaluation of the media mix. "Not that advertisers are likely to shift media plans overnight, but they continually reassess and change the mix," Mr. Brandt says.

"A lot of media planning has developed because of slow changes in cpm. You reach turning points for various products. An advertiser may say, 'I'm willing to divert 5% to 7% of my money into spot tv versus network,'" Mr. Brandt says. At this point, the reach and frequency of the media become important considerations.

Bates favors development of a basic media plan and several alternatives, Mr. Brandt says. Alternative plans usually have several options for experimentation with various media.

"In good conscience as a professional media planner, you have to address these issues. Will a dollar spent in another media, get you more?" he asks.

over-all industry or the independent sector. (Cash flow as used here is a pro forma measure calculated by adding back depreciation and amortization to pretax income.) The ad-supported sector's pretax operating income margin rose to 17.4% in 1984, while its cash flow margin increased to 20%.

The three print segments, consumer and business magazine publishing and newspaper publishing, lead (in that order) all others in the communications industry in terms of both 1984 operating income return on assets and 1984 cash flow return on assets. Consumer magazine publishing's cash flow return on assets, at 56.5%, is particularly impressive.

The segments represent data totals for 115 company business segments. VS&A reports a company's communications segment, such as consumer magazines, under the VS&A communications category of the same name when the company's revenue in that segment is 60% or more of total revenue for that segment.

Many companies group their communications segments within larger categories whose over-all revenue may dwarf those contributed by communications activities. In these cases, where revenue is known, VS&A places them in a "miscellaneous" category.

The segment-by-segment picture is generally one of accelerating revenue growth accompanied by margin expansion, both in pretax operating income margins and cash flow margins.

appeal at 35-year-olds and others start at 45.

Other that have found their niche include KFAC (am, fm), the lone classical outlet in the metro area. The spring Arbitron ratings book gave the combination station a 1.2, but according to Mr. Klein, "KFAC is an overachiever and never talks numbers. They're involved in another aspect of radio selling—who are these listeners, what kind of life styles do they lead?"

The format smorgasbord available to advertisers also includes black/urban stations, KJLH (fm), KACE (fm) and KDAY (am), and Hispanic radio where there is a struggle between leader, KTNQ (am) and KSKQ-FM, KLVE (fm) and KWKW (am). KZLA-FM and KLAC (am) have no other competition in their country format.

Ms. Kaplan says demographics and age still don't totally sell a station. "Most people would consider Rick Dees at KIIS the dominant personality in this market today, but you have to ask, 'what happens at KIIS when he's not on the air?' "

A media buyer should make a station selection based on the different types of personalities within that category—"personalities that can deliver. Others may say I'm way off base," she says, "but the market is so competitive that nobody or station—not even KIIS—owns it."

quisitions this past year have indicated, broadcast stations are dearly valued assets. The prices paid in some recent transactions —among them Taft Broadcasting's acquisition of Gulf Broadcast Co. and Rupert Murdoch's purchase of the Metromedia stations—attest to the attractive, stable cash flows associated with broadcasting.

Broadcasting's higher profitability relative to the other communications segments is demonstrated by looking at its revenue and income contribution to industry results. In 1984, broadcasting accounted for more than one-quarter of the industry's operating income, even though it accounts for only one-fifth of the industry's total revenues.

Broadcasting revenue increased 17% in 1984 over the prior year, the highest annual growth rate during the 1980-84 period. But the segment's operating income bettered that performance in 1984, advancing 22.2%, another period record. In cash flow terms, the accepted measure of profitability in broadcasting, growth has paralleled that of operating income.

More than in any other segments in the communications industry, margins for broadcasting have held static on a year-to-year basis since 1980.

Broadcasting's operating income margin has increased only 0.4 percentage points since 1980, while cash flow margins have increased 0.8 points.

Newspaper publishing

Like broadcasting, newspaper publishing has been a target of corporate purchasers attracted by the stability and high margins of the business. The Des Moines Register & Tribune Co. and the Evening News Assn. in Detroit both recently were acquired by Gannett Co. after unsolicited bids sparked interest.

Of the ad-supported segments, newspapers felt the impact of the last recession the hardest because of their direct dependence on retail advertising. Growth in newspaper operating profits stalled in 1982, but profits have continued to expand during the past two years.

On a 1984 revenue increase of 16.3%, the segment's operating income grew 18.9%. The percentage income growth was less than that for the prior year, which had benefited from the lack of growth in 1982. Still, operating income growth in 1984 exceeded its 16.8% five-year compound annual growth rate.

In this compound annual growth measure, and in others for revenues and assets, newspaper publishing ranks in the middle of the communications industry.

For what is a greatly asset-dependent segment of the communications industry, newspaper publishing's return on asset performance is excellent. In 1984, newspapers posted a 28.1% pretax operating income return on assets and a 33.1% cash flow return. Only the two magazine publishing segments bettered this performance.

Business and consumer magazines

Magazine publishing is by far the most efficient user of assets in the communications industry. Put another way, it takes fewer assets to generate comparable revenue and income from magazine operations than from any other communications business.

Even among the two segments, however, there is a substantial difference in the weight of the asset base.

Consumer magazine asset turnover—the ratio of annual revenue to average assets—was 4.5 times in 1984.In contrast, business magazine publishing's 1984 asset turnover was 2.3 times. The asset turnover of both magazine publishing segments dramatically betters the communications industry asset turnover of 1.2 times a year.

Magazine publishing, albeit an efficient user of assets, ranks near the bottom of the communications industry in terms of revenue growth. Over the past five years, consumer magazine publishing has performed the better of the two segments, with 10% annually compounded growth, compared with business magazines' 8.4% growth.

The story is brighter on the operating income side. Consumer magazine publishing registered 21.6% compound annual growth, placing third in the communications industry. Business magazine publishing's 13.1% compound rate bettered revenue growth by more than one-third.

Brighter still, 1984 was the best year since 1980 for operating income growth for both segments. Bolstered by a strong gain at Time Inc., consumer magazine income leaped 50.3% —by far the highest segment gain in the communications industry. Business magazines also had a stellar year, boosting income 27.7% and continuing the pattern of acceleration that began the prior year.

Since 1980, the agency business has racked up strong gains in revenue that have not been wholly matched by gains in income. Over the five-year period, VS&A's ad segment posted a 14.5% compound annual growth in revenue, good enough to place the segment third in the communications industry behind two other rapid growth segments—cable and pay tv and business information services.

Over five years, operating income has increased at only a 12.4% annual clip, better than just three other industry segments. The segment grew 19.1% in income in 1984, however, on a revenue increase of 15.5%.

While most communications segments improved their operating margins in 1984 compared with 1980, advertising's margins languished. The segment's operating income margin dropped eight-tenths of a percentage point from 1980. Its cash flow margin declined half a point.

This margin shrinkage helped make advertising's 1984 operating income and cash flow margins among the shallowest in the business and crimped its return on assets performance.

In 1984 the agencies and agency groups VS&A studied posted operating income margins of 10.2%. Cash flow margins were two points higher, at 12.4%, and more in line with the communications industry median. Operating income return on assets of 8.9% bettered the results of only two segments. Cash flow return on assets of 9.8% was better. AA

Moves cut agency media billings

By WILLIAM F. GLOEDE and SCOTT HUME

Media billings and the 15% agency commission—the biggest contributors to ad agency revenues—are facing serious challenges from some of the country's biggest advertisers.

With increasing frequency, major advertisers are taking upon themselves the struggle against rising costs and declining audiences in all media. This movement has heightened anxiety among agencies as they assess the following developments:

• Anheuser-Busch, St. Louis, is moving its media buying out of D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, hiring away from DMB&B the people who had worked on its media account and setting up its own media operation in New York.

• R.J. Reynolds Industries, Winston-Salem, N.C., is considering merging Nabisco Brands' Ohlmeyer Communications, New York, into its existing in-house print and outdoor media operation, though no final decision is expected before the end of the year.

• Carl Icahn's New York-based Trans World Airlines threatened to yank its account from Ogilvy & Mather unless that agency agreed to work on an even-lower fee basis than it had before. O&M kept the account, but is said to be working for a below-10% fee.

• Jos. E. Seagram & Sons, New York, is pulling about $55 million in billings from agency control as it sets up House of Seagram Media, an in-house media planning and buying operation handling all media except broadcast (AA, Nov. 11).

• Miami-based Burger King Corp.'s agency, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, is trying to place $70 million in spot tv spending on an upfront basis, an extremely unusual tactic. The goal is to bring in the same spot tv media weight as last year, but for 20% less cost.

• General Motors Corp., Detroit, this year reassigned media buying by daypart in tv and by category in magazines, among other media, in order to get greater efficiencies for its five-division ad spending of about $1 billion. There are also reports that GM, too, is looking to renegotiate its agency commission rates—downward—and has hired former Benton & Bowles exec vp Phil Guarascio to oversee and execute the move toward greater efficiencies and savings.

• AT&T, New York, also reassigned its broadcast buying thi year along daypart lines, saying was matching what most othe major advertisers already do but Smelling blood, several agencies recently have approached Anheuser-Busch about the $35 million-to-$40 million Michelob account handled by Ted Bates Advertising/New York.

Agencies not on A-B's roster said by sources to be trying for a shot at the account include Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, Ogilvy & Mather and Young & Rubicam. According to one source, Y&R last week managed to get in the brewer's door to make a speculative presentation on the brand.

An A-B spokesman declined comment on the report.

M-E adds Nestle work, gives Sennott wider role

By STEWART ALTER

NEW YORK—Having received an additional $30 million to $35 million in overseas business from Nestle S.A., McCann-Erickson Worldwide has tapped Michael Sennott as its new exec vp-director of worldwide accounts.

Nestle, however, will be but one of the accounts Mr. Sennott will oversee on a worldwide basis.

With that promotion, Mr. Sennott, 44, becomes one of the key members of the agency's management group. He had shared responsibilities as managing director of the $400 million New York office with John Dooner Jr., 37, who has been promoted to general manager.

Although the Nestle appointments are all made on a local basis, the assignments from that company in effect make McCann the worldwide agency on Nescafe, Quik chocolates and the Maggi brands of culinary products, which include soups.

McCann has picked up the Nestle assignment in Austria, England, Spain, Switzerland, Kenya, Puerto Rico, Brazil, Chile, Dominican Republic, Mexico, Venezuela, Australia, Hong Kong, Singapore, Thailand and the Philippines. Those all had been handled by individual agencies on a country-by-country basis.

The other finalists were Scali, McCabe, Sloves and Waring and LaRosa. Jordan, Case, Taylor & McGrath, which had handled the account for seven years, declined an offer to keep Burrough's.

IOC, Coca-Cola run out new sponsorship deal

NEW YORK—The International Olympic Committee and Coca-Cola Co., Atlanta, are expected to announce a plan under which companies that are "official sponsors" of the 1988 Olympics in Calgary and Seoul will pay only one fee to the IOC for the right to advertise their official sponsor status worldwide. This fee is over and above the fee paid to be an official sponsor. In the past, sponsors had to pay a fee to the Olympic committee in each country where they advertised their official sponsor status. Not all committees have agreed to the new plan, however.

Shearson offers new alternatives for agency

NEW YORK—Shearson Lehman Brothers, in reviewing its $20 million account at McCann-Erickson (AA, Nov. 21), has added for consideration the options of assigning just the media buying elsewhere or restructuring account management for its business at McCann. Shearson continues, as previously reported, to look at other Interpublic agencies as alternatives, too. MLB thumbs Gillette

All-Star fan balloting thrown out

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

Major League Baseball played more marketing hardball this month, ending Gillette Co.'s 16-year sponsorship of fan balloting for its All-Star Game.

It's nearly certain the selection of next summer's all-star teams will be taken away from the fans for the first time since 1969 and turned over either to players or sportswriters.

Last month, MLB stole the thunder of Sport, presenting its own Chevrolet-sponsored Most Valuable Player award after the World Series for the first time—something Sport had done for 30 years. The magazine went ahead and presented its own award anyway, sponsored by Ford Motor Co. (AA, Nov. 4).

Baseball executives told Boston-based Gillette they no longer want to continue the nationally sponsored all-star balloting that Gillette has funded. The breakup followed what sources said was a poker game of

Media—battle of the budget 1
Media billings and the 15% agency commission—the biggest contributors to ad agency revenues—are facing serious challenges from some of the country's biggest advertisers. With increasing frequency, major advertisers are taking upon themselves the struggle against rising costs and declining audiences in all media.

Vultures circle Michelob account 1
Smelling blood, several agencies have approached Anheuser-Busch about the $35 million Michelob account handled by Ted Bates/Advertising, New York.

Shops, marketers differ on '86 3
Marketers may be planning smaller advertising budget increases for 1986 than their agencies are banking on. The differing ad spending forecasts appear in a new report from Oppenheimer & Co., the New York brokerage.

IBM tunes up pc pitch 3
IBM Corp.'s effort to force computer retailers to buy up huge inventories of slow-moving machines has flopped, and Big Blue is shifting its pre-Christmas sales pitch directly to consumers. IBM has launched a sweepstakes promotion for its PC AT personal computer, offering consumers $154,000 worth of free hardware, software and peripherals.

Time execs are a'changin' 4
Time Inc.'s major restructuring of its magazine group involves 18 top executives, but no surprises should emerge when the dust settles. The reorganization, unveiled last week, had been rumored here for the past month.

Deck the halls, quickly 6
Uncertain about the direction of retail sales for Christmas, some retailers and marketers have hauled out the holly a bit sooner than usual this year. But stalwarts stick to the belief that 80% of holiday purchases will occur between Thanksgiving and Christmas.

Smokeless signals visible 10
Legislation that would force health warnings into ads for smokeless-tobacco products won the unanimous backing of a key committee in the Senate last week. Tobacco marketing executives now must ask, if Congress takes action against ads for chewing tobacco, snuff and other smokeless products, can the $700 million industry live with graphic health warnings in tv and radio ads?

POPAI gets wired 12
Walking through the exhibit area of Marketplace '85, the Point-of-Purchase Advertising Institute's trade show, one trend becomes instantly clear: Electronics is the cardboard of the '80s.

FNN's everybody's business 32
Ever since it became profitable in January, Financial News Network—the self-described "business channel"—has been booking more and more nonfinancial advertisers. A key factor in FNN's "skyrocketing" sales is aiming its programing at a broader target audience than in the past. In Videotech.

Print ads honored 46
The newspaper industry honored the creative efforts of 14 ad agencies at a reception Nov. 21 by awarding them Athenas, or Award to Honor Excellent Newspaper Advertising.

NEW PRODUCTS

Self-care interest high 43
Interest in self-care has spurred new-product development in health & beauty aids while demand for convenience has created opportunities for companies in another nonfood area—household products.

INTERNATIONAL

Univision new Latin ad buy 30
Multinational marketers soon may be able to advertise in most of Latin America on a regular basis in one media buy through Univision Inc., a new company set up by Mexican tv giant Televisa. The company is offering program packages to Latin American affiliates in exchange for rights to advertising time.

Kiwi fruit—dull brown and fuzzy 30
Kiwi fruit, although to some it looks as impressive "as an old tennis ball," nevertheless represents one of the great marketing success stories of the past decade. This year the New Zealand Kiwifruit Authority expects to earn more than $112.6 million in overseas sales.

Japanese women's Dentsu Eye 31
A subsidiary of Dentsu, Japan's largest ad agency, is staffed entirely by women who create advertising for women's products. In the U.S. such an agency would not be exceptional, but in Japan it is.

Meredith picks up 'Journal,' 'Health'

By GARY LEVIN and STUART J. ELLIOTT

Meredith Corp. is expected to heat up the already intense competition in the women's service and health magazine fields with its planned acquisition of Ladies' Home Journal and Health for $96 million from Family Media, New York.

Bringing its vast resources to the two titles—including printing sites, a network of sales offices and the experience of its Better Homes & Gardens—Meredith may improve upon the performance of the privately held Family Media, which will become a substantially smaller operation with the sale.

Meredith will join Hearst Corp., New York—publisher of Good Housekeeping and Redbook—as

NBC offer turns off Turner

By MAURINE CHRISTOPHER

While Ted Turner has indicated he may be able to eke out his $1.5 billion purchase of MGM-UA Entertainment Co. without selling part of Cable News Network, he still is hoping Time Inc., Gannett Co., Rupert Murdoch or someone else will agree to buy half of CNN for $300 million.

Yet no potential partner rushed in late last week to replace NBC as the most likely candidate to ease Mr. Turner's financial crunch.

Mr. Turner, chairman and principal owner of Turner Broadcasting System, Atlanta, wants a partner who will not try to push him out of the pic-

Chicago Bears all-purpose player William (The Refrigerator) Perry is proving his versatility off the field, here taking directions during last week's shoot of a national McDonald's commercial. The spot is to break Dec. 2 on ABC's "Monday Night Football" game between Chicago and Miami. McDonald's officials last week were considering running ads in USA Today to herald the Fridge's commercial debut. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, is McDonald's agency. Mr. Perry also will be working this week with W.B. Doner & Co., Southfield, Mich., to film a local spot for the Chicago Pontiac Dealers Assn., after which SSC&B, New York, plans a Coke/Coke Classic spot with him and Bears quarterback Jim McMahon (AA, Nov. 21).

IBM eyes consumers with pc promo wave

By BRIAN MORAN

LAS VEGAS—IBM Corp.'s effort to force computer retailers to buy up huge inventories of slow-moving machines has flopped, and Big Blue is shifting its pre-Christmas sales pitch directly to consumers.

IBM has launched a sweepstakes promotion for its PC AT personal computer, offering consumers $154,000 worth of free hardware, software and peripherals. Armonk, N.Y.-based IBM has mailed more than 1 million brochures to customers for that effort, dubbed the "AT high-performance sweepstakes."

To hype Christmas-season interest in its discontinued PCjr machine, IBM last week slashed prices by 50% on more than eight selected software programs and on PCjr joysticks. That promotion effort includes mailings to hundreds of thousands of PCjr owners.

Computer dealers attending the Comdex trade show here last week viewed the new consumer promotions as part of a broad, concerted effort by IBM to restore some luster to its reputation.

Dealers here said IBM stumbled badly with a fall rebate promotion (AA, Oct. 7) that required dealers to order large numbers of machines to qualify for discounts.

Many dealers said they ignored IBM's rebate plan, which relied on retailers to pass discounts on to consumers. Many computer dealers, hard hit by the industry's sales slump, viewed the plan as self-serving for IBM and refused to commit to stockpiling large volumes of IBM systems.

IBM's inventory-thinning scheme, designed to prop up its fourth-quarter results, then stalled.

Analysts are projecting only a 15%-to-20% increase in IBM pc sales this year, far below the huge growth surge of 40% between 1983 and 1984. Rumors about an early 1986 introduction of a new generation of products apparently have damaged sales of IBM's current line.

"Tying up dealer capital with vast quantities of products. . .doesn't benefit anyone in the long term."

—John Young, president, Hewlett-Packard

The PC AT and PCjr promotions, by offering direct incentives to consumers, are likely to boost store traffic and shore up IBM's reputation with retailers.

Widespread dealer backlash to the original rebate plan also prompted IBM to ease some qualification terms earlier this month. Rob Wilson, an IBM spokesman in Boca Raton, Fla., confirmed the program has been modified "based on dealer feedback" but he declined to provide details.

(Under the original plan, dealers reportedly had to surpass this year's January-to-June sales by at least 70% during the last quarter to qualify for discounts.)

Dealers attending Comdex said the holiday consumer promotions seemed to fit in with another major "appeasement" move by IBM. On the eve of the show's opening Nov. 20, IBM announced it would immediately halt the growth of its dealer network for pcs.

By limiting the number of authorized dealers to the current level of 2,500, IBM is seen as trying to inspire Shops too bullish on '86 ad budget hopes?

By STEWART ALTER

Marketers may be planning smaller advertising budget increases for 1986 than their agencies are expecting.

The differing ad spending forecasts appear in a new report from Oppenheimer & Co., the New York brokerage company. "Our most recent discussions with agency managements reveal an expectation of 8%-to-9% average expenditure growth from existing clients, exclusive of new assignments," wrote Oppenheimer analyst Charles Crane.

"However, a survey of marketing executives at a number of leading advertisers reveals somewhat more modest plans," Mr. Crane said. "A majority of those surveyed expressed a willingness to increase their budgets, but by no more than the secular inflation rate, i.e., 4% to 5%."

The survey was informal, talking to marketing executives at eight of the top consumer-goods companies. "These marketers seem to recognize the need for advertising to support the value of their brand franchises; at the same time, more than one voiced concern that ad-to-sales ratios had risen too far and that it was time to cut back a bit," according to the report.

Fearing "agency expectations may be unrealistically high, setting the stage for another year of disappointing [profit] margins as revenue growth falls short of expense growth," the analyst removed two agency stocks from his recommended list: Interpublic Group of Cos. and JWT Group.

Oppenheimer was not optimistic about the yearend results for 1985 either. "Domestic advertising expenditures decelerated still further in the third quarter, and there now appears to be considerable risk that spending will remain depressed in the current quarter as well," said the report. "Even at this late date, it is unclear whether enough advertisers will make a last-minute holiday rush to salvage fourth-quarter and full-year revenue growth rates. Whereas several weeks ago our sources were reporting an onslaught of fourth-quarter and full-year confirmations, subsequent weeks have brought numerous late cancellations of prior media commitments."#

New household products bow

By LAURIE FREEMAN

Household cleaning products that are convenient, easy to use and do more than one task are the big winners in today's marketplace, where an increasing number of dual-career households are more likely to buy a videocassette recorder than a new vacuum cleaner.

Reaching these households also is challenging marketers in the estimated $9 billion cleaning-products category to come up with different advertising approaches.

Although the higher-income households have the means to buy more products, household members rarely are at home to use them. And nonwork time more often is used for socializing than silver-polishing.

As a result, marketers are tempering their reliance on such traditional advertising vehicles as daytime tv "soap operas" to reach consumers. Direct mail and couponing have become more popular means of reaching both men and women.

In 1984, fewer than 11% of American

Blair puts printing, fsi operations on block

By PAUL L. EDWARDS

NEW YORK—John Blair & Co.'s decision last week to negotiate the sale of its printing and Sunday newspaper freestanding insert operations has quieted speculation that the entire company might be acquired and raised the possibility that remaining portions of the business may be taken private.

Officially, the company said it would use the proceeds to reduce the company's debt and related interest costs.

The restructuring program announced by Jack Fritz, president-ceo, calls for the retention of Blair's broadcasting and direct-mail businesses. He said the program is the result of a strategic planning review conducted by the company in consultation with Salomon Brothers. The investment banking company, retained this spring to assist in the review, now will assist in the implementation of

Time changes bolster Sutton's position

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

NEW YORK—Time Inc.'s major restructuring of its magazine group involves 18 top executives, but no surprises should emerge when the dust settles.

The reorganization, unveiled last week, had been rumored here for the past month. It is not a shake-up since, as usually happens at Time Inc., the moves involve only in-house staffers and leave intact the basic demographic makeup at the top.

The shifts are significant, however, in bolstering the position of Kelso Sutton, 46, who takes a new post as the group's president-ceo while continuing as a Time Inc. exec vp. Two young publishers who long have been identified as Mr. Sutton's rising stars get key promotions: S. Christopher Meigher III, 39, and Robert Miller, 36.

"As I'm really now spending 30% of my time on corporate things. . .I thought I'd put in some people I thought would be able to devote themselves fulltime to operating big components of the business," Mr. Sutton explained. He has been "thinking long and hard about reorganization," he said, because the group has "a lot going on, a much fuller plate than we've had in a long time." He cited the acquisitions of Asiaweek and Southern Progress Corp., as well as the latter's own acquisition of W.R.C. Smith Publishing Co., and the current test "of a big weekly magazine [Picture Week], with other magazines we've tested that are in the background."

K. Sutton

S.C. Meigher III

R. Miller

The magazine group is "aggressive, going after a lot of opportunities," said Mr. Sutton, and "needs to be run well by people. . .very close to operations and to the marketplace, really responsive to what is happening with subscribers, with clients, to competition." Messrs. Meigher and Miller fit that description, he said.

As for any speculation Mr. Sutton is setting up a race between two proteges to succeed him eventually, he replied, "I'm a young man. I'll be around here a long time, doing what I'm doing."

Departing the group are two members of its older guard and a relative newcomer. Philip Howlett, 57, senior vp-magazines, and James McCluskey, 56, director-corporate manufacturing and distributing, are taking early retirement. And James Heyworth, 43, who became senior vp-magazines from deputy group vp-video in March, 1984, has "decided to seek new opportunities elsewhere," Mr. Sutton wrote in a memo, after the two "agreed" there was "no position for him in the new structure that is suitable for him."

The new structure brings three M's to Mr. Sutton's side: John Meyers, Time's publisher, named chairman-magazine group, a new post, who will serve as what Mr. Sutton called "my senior advisor," and Messrs. Meigher and Miller, publishers of People and Sports Illustrated, respectively, taking new posts as group publishers. In realigning responsibilities previously altered in 1983 and '84, each group publisher will oversee certain publications, along with functions such as corporate circulation, no longer a separate department; strategy and market research, and the publishing side of magazine development. Other operations remain single units, but will report to one or the other group publisher.

Mr. Meigher's bailiwick is Fortune, Money, Time and Southern Progress. His group director-circulation, is Michael Klingensmith, formerly general manager, Time. His director-strategic research and development is Ruth Shields, formerly general manager-corporate circulation. Mr. Meigher also supervises human resources; named director is Susan Geisenheimer, formerly director-staff resources.

Mr. Miller's bailiwick is Discover, Life, People and Sports Illustrated. His group director-circulation, is Eric Thorkilsen, formerly associate director-corporate circulation. His director-strategic research and development is Bruce Hallett, formerly his assistant at SI, with the title assistant to the publisher.

Mr. Miller also supervises corporate manufacturing and distribution; named director, to succeed Mr. McCluskey, is Richard Angle Jr., formerly director-corporate circulation.

As for magazine development, both Messrs. Meigher and Miller are to work with Marshall Loeb, editor-magazine development. Bruce Barnet, publisher-magazine development, continues to report to Mr. Sutton, as does Picture Week magazine (see story, Page 49). Rounding out the group's restructured executive ranks is John Howard, formerly its financial director, who is named chief financial officer.

A rundown on the changes farther down the ranks as a result of the need to replace those moving up (no execs at Fortune, Life or Money are involved):

People: Succeeding Mr. Meigher as publisher is Donald Elliman Jr., formerly publishing director, Time International.

Sports Illustrated: Succeeding Mr. Miller as publisher is Donald Barr, associate publisher-advertising sales director, who was passed over in June, 1983, when Mr. Miller was named SI's publisher to succeed Mr. Howlett. Succeeding Mr. Barr, as ad sales director, is Thomas Hickey Jr., formerly ad sales manager.

Time: Succeeding Mr. Meyers as publisher is Richard Thomas, formerly associate publisher-worldwide advertising director. Succeeding Mr. Thomas is John Crowley Jr. formerly U.S. ad sales director, apparently unscathed by his much-publicized wooing earlier this year by rival U.S. News & World Report. And succeeding Mr. Klingensmith as general manager is Barbara Mrkonic, formerly associate publisher-general manager, Discover.#

Del Monte pays over dolls

WASHINGTON—For Del Monte Corp., selling fruits and vegetables has turned out to be easier than selling dolls.

Without admitting guilt, the San Francisco-based subsidiary of R.J. Reynolds Industries has agreed to pay $100,000 to settle a Federal Trade Commission complaint that it failed to comply with federal mail-order regulations during its 1982 and '83 coupon promotion for Country Yumkin dolls.

The complaint said Del Monte failed to inform customers within the required time that it could not provide the dolls on time; didn't offer customers the option of agreeing to the delayed deliveries or getting a refund, and didn't provide a postage-paid card that could be used for exercising that option.

The consent also prohibits the package-foods company from future violations of the commission's mail-order rules.#

American's 'special' ads score

By JULIE FRANZ

This has been a tough year for the airline industry, but American Airlines is proving that it's still possible to capture jaded travelers' attention with fresh, aggressive advertising.

In October, American broke a new series of tv spots, via Bozell & Jacobs/Southwest, aimed at achievers and status-conscious business executives, themed "When you're something special, people know it" (AA, Oct. 28).

Those commercials appear to be something special. Last month, American's ads came to mind first to 15.4% of consumers when asked to name the first airline advertising to come to mind of any seen, heard or read in the past month. That's a gain of six percentage points from American's 9.4% awareness posted in September.

The carrier, whose ads haven't captured a first-place finish in ADVERTISING AGE's monthly adWatch survey since April, spent the past several months trailing airlines whose awareness levels often were boosted by unfortunate, nonadvertising events: United Airlines (pilot strike), Trans World Airlines (hijacking) and Delta Airlines (Dallas crash).

Awareness of American's ads reached its low point this year in June with a 7.7% share of first mentions.

American's new campaign keeps its umbrella "Something special in the air" tag line but dumped scenes of comely employes happily doling out champagne and coffee while various cloud formations slowly drift past the airplane windows. Also gone are tourist brochure-like cuts of fun-in-the-sun destinations.

Instead, the new American ads show everything going right for the business travelers. In one spot, a weary executive returning late from a business trip is confronted with the good news and the bad news. For the good news, the client he had visited had phoned in an order. The bad news? The boss is sending Mr. Executive on another trip. But, surprise, the trip is for two—to Hawaii.

Last month's awareness scores for the rest of the category look like someone shuffled the deck. American usurped United's No. 1 rank, which it had held since May. United's ad awareness slipped into the No. 2 spot (13.3% of first mentions, down 3.1 points) while Eastern gained 1.6 points to an 8.8% share and the No. 3 position, up from No. 5 in September.

TWA fell to No. 4 (8.7%), down from second position last month with 10.5% recall.

It's no surprise that TWA's awareness took such a drop. The company's recall score was given a significant boost when one of its planes was hijacked in the Middle East and then later by its highly publicized takeover by financier Carl Icahn.

TWA's ad awareness may not recover quickly, given the new owner's decision to slash the $70 million ad budget (AA, Nov. 11).

AdWatch is a joint project of ADVERTISING AGE and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb.

Ad awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample of consumers to name ads in a variety of product categories that first come to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

In October, 1,000 adults were

Harper knows how to work his territory

BOOK REVIEW

NEW YORK—Continuing the advertising-industry practice of packaging new-business presentations between book covers, Needham Harper Worldwide is out with "Working the Territory" by Paul Harper.

The lavishly illustrated book can easily take its place on coffee tables alongside other biogs-cum-pitches by Ted Bates' Rosser Reeves ("Reality in Advertising"), Ogilvy & Mather's David Ogilvy ("Confessions of an Advertising Man" and "Ogilvy on Advertising"), Foote, Cone & Belding's John O'Toole ("The Trouble With Advertising") and Jerry Della Femina ("From Those Wonderful Folks. . ."). Take its place; that is, if one can get one's hands on it. Published by Prentice-Hall, the book is not for sale; it's edifying contents are for Needham employes, media and clients past, present and, they hope, future.

Since Mr. Harper has always stood for truth in advertising, it should be noted that his book qualifies for the "truth in advertising" seal. It is subtitled: "60 Years of Advertising from the People of Needham Harper Worldwide."

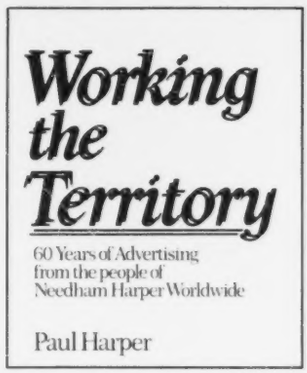
And that's exactly what it is.

With his level-headed, detailed commentary, Mr. Harper provides informed and informative examples of how clients and the agency apply their skills to the task of dealing with an ever-changing marketplace. How well it deals with "the turbulence of the marketplace," he states, is the "real hallmark of an ad agency."

In dealing with examples of that turbulence, he has created a testament to some of the finest advertising around.

He takes the reader through campaigns, explains why and how they came together and reports on the results. But don't look for any surprises, or much about Paul Harper's career, life or life style. Rather than talk about himself, this agency leader of unsurpassed civility, high standards and principle chooses to focus on "working the territory."

To explain what he means by the book's title, Mr. Harper recalls his first job, when his boss called him in, showed him where his overblown, romantic copy for Swift & Co.'s animal feeds was missing its target, and said, "The only answer for you, Harper, is to get out and work the territory. Get out where the feed is fed. Ask questions and listen hard." Mr. Harper visited a farm and was told by the farmer, "All I want to know from you folks is how I'm going to get those steers ready for market a week sooner." The young copywriter learned an important lesson: He would have to discover the needs and attitudes related to each assignment handed him.



He goes on to pinpoint techniques used in achieving six basic goals: Establish a product personality, position the product clearly, feature the most compelling benefit, break the pattern by finding a distinctive look and sound, generate trust and appeal to both heart and head.

Among the examples are State Farm, Honda, Xerox, Crayola, ITT, RCA and McDonald's. He delves into radio's heyday with Fibber McGee & Molly and their sponsor, Johnson's Wax, and Jack Benny for State Farm. In discussing McDonald's, he notes that the agency had to break through a powerful negative perception: Eating fast-food was a last resort. He tells how the agency stressed family values, a refuge from "daily pressures," managed to personalize the message ("You. . .you're the one") and saw McDonald's sales grow from $550 million to more than $6 billion in its 11 years with the account.

Now, that's "working the territory."

Mr. Harper began his career in 1946 as a junior copywriter and retired last year as Needham chairman-ceo. A former chairman of the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies, he now serves Needham Harper Worldwide as chairman emeritus.

He sees advertising as neither an art nor a science, but "a blending of persuasive effects, some new, some old, that together build a vivid and appealing product personality."

He salutes his successor, Keith Reinhard, and earlier Needham leaders such as Bill Steers, Blair Vedder and Jim Isham, and goes on to sum up the essence of the ad agency about as well as any one of his fellow executives-turned-authors. Agencies, he concludes, are "really nothing more than a confederation of people who agree to work together to make the most of their talents." They are held together only by an "unwritten bond made up of common standards, mutual respect and good will."

When "the right people" join in this spirit, he says, "you get motion, you get fire and you get great advertising."

Like any effective new-business pitch, the book adds style, flair and high standards to the learning process.#—Fred Danzig

Hewlett-Packard plays 'what if' with pcs

By CLEVELAND HORTON

PALO ALTO, CAL.—Hewlett-Packard Co., which failed to gain the desired recognition and sales in its first efforts to crack the personal computer market, is trying again. This time around it's using a new strategy and a new agency as its wedge.

The $6 billion company, best known in the scientific and engineering fields, waited one year to put its new strategy to work in the national campaign that broke Nov. 24 (AA, Nov. 18).

In a departure from previous national ad efforts, the campaign intentionally avoids any hard-sell for specific products, focusing instead on the problem-solving prowess of the company and its employes.

The new campaign, estimated at more than $10 million, marks the first comprehensive H-P campaign from Leo Burnett USA, Chicago.

"We're selling solutions, not computers," said J.C. Dennis, marketing communications manager for H-P's Information Systems & Network division. IS&N is funding the new campaign.

H-P hopes the effort will enhance its image as a corporation, in addition to spurring sales of its computer systems.

The tv commercials present H-P as a company dedicated to customer service. The initial four tv spots describe H-P employes as people who never stop asking "What if" questions to help solve a customer's problem. There is no mention of individual components of H-P's Personal Productivity Center, a minicomputer-based system using pcs.

Print ads will echo the tone of the tv spots with the "What if" theme, but they will include more product information.

The first tv spots broke during National Football League telecasts. The print campaign will follow in major national business and general interest publications.

H-P revised its strategy because of the growing sophistication of the general marketplace, Mr. Dennis explained. "Customers are asking for much more than a stand-alone pc," he said.

The company now considers its pcs to be components of larger systems, though it won't refuse to sell them individually.

The new campaign marks a 14-month effort by Burnett, which won the H-P account one year ago from J. Walter Thompson USA, San Francisco (AA, Sept. 25, '84). In the interim, Burnett produced two product-specific print campaigns.

After a corporate restructuring late last year, H-P decided to address its lack of name awareness in the general business community, said Angelo Pagano, IS&N director of advertising. Before that, H-P successfully marketed it products to the scientific and engineering communities using specialized media, such as trade publications.

The general business community is a much more complex and unpredictable market to reach, Mr. Pagano said. But the size of the business market for computers and computer systems makes that market an attractive one for any computer marketer. That prompted H-P to increase ad spending for IS&N.

Although H-P has been unable to capture more than about 2% of the $17.8 billion pc market, it claims to have the largest base of minicomputers used in business today.

Lewis shop adds creative chief, changes name

OAKLAND, CAL.—ComputerLand Corp.'s new agency, founded by the giant computer retailer's former senior vp-marketing, Roger Lewis, last week added a creative director and a new name to its corporate moniker.

Robert Browand, formerly creative director at the Phillips Organisation, San Diego, will join the new Oakland-based agency, now called Lewis, Browand & Associates. At Phillips, associate creative director Carol Golden succeeds Mr. Browand.

The new shop plans to present itself as an old-fashion agency. "We'll be more like agencies in the '50s and '60s, when marketing plans were written by the agency," said Mr. Lewis, whose title is president. The agency doesn't yet have any other clients, but hopes to shortly.

ComputerLand's former agency, Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco, resigned the account (AA, Nov. 4).

In a similar move, ComputerLand's general counsel, Ronald Helm, is leaving the franchisor to start his own practice, taking on ComputerLand as his first client.

ComputerLand will suspend national advertising at the end of this year (AA, Oct. 14).

The chain still has around $4 million in advertising funds, committed to pay for collateral materials.

The Lewis agency's one-year contract with ComputerLand is based on a fee, rather than a commission on billings.

Mr. Lewis began his marketing career in 1968 with J. Walter Thompson in New York, before moving to General Foods for eight years. He then shifted to JWT, San Francisco, as deputy general manager in charge of new business for four years. After a short stint as a new-product consultant, he joined ComputerLand 2½ years ago.#—C.H.

questioned by telephone. Under adWatch methodology, an increase or decrease of 2.8 percentage points is considered statistically significant and attributable to more than sample variation.

Seven-Up Co.'s 7UP returned to its customary third-place spot in the soft-drink category last month with 2.9% of first mentions. That bumped Coca-Cola Co.'s Cherry Coke down to the No. 4 position after making an impressive third-place debut in September.

Cherry Coke's ad awareness score dropped 1.5 points to 1.2% from 2.7% in September.

Coca-Cola remained in the category's top spot but lost 1.4 points to 41.7% of first mentions. Pepsi gained 0.1 point to 27.7% awareness and Pepsi-Cola Co.'s Slice reentered the top five in fifth with 1.1% awareness.

Consumers asked to recall the first advertising they'd seen, heard or read in the last month, regardless of product category, named Coca-Cola 4.7% of the time, down 2.9 points from 7.6% in September. But that score was still good enough to keep Coke in the No. 1 spot in over-all ad awareness.

The top 10 in over-all, unaided awareness (without asking for a specific product category) in October were, in descending order: Coca-Cola, Miller/Miller Lite (Miller Brewing Co.), Pepsi, Budweiser/Bud Light (Anheuser-Busch), Ford, McDonald's, Chevrolet (General Motors), Wendy's, Burger King and General Motors.

Among other significant changes in the October survey results:

- Burger King added 3.1 percentage points to its October score, getting 14.5% of first mentions in the fast-food category, passing Wendy's into the No. 2 spot.

  Wendy's "Choose fresh. Choose Wendy's" ads, via Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, garnered an 11.7% share of top-of-mind recall in October, down from 12.6% in September. McDonald's, behind the strength of the McD.L.T. lettuce-and-tomato hamburger, remained firmly entrenched at the top with 43.3% of first mentions, down slightly from the September survey results. Burger King's latest surge marks a turning point from August and September, when it languished in third place behind Wendy's and McDonald's. BK hit its 1985 high in July with 19% of first mentions.

  Last month, BK management announced its dissatisfaction with marginal sales gains from recent ad campaigns, citing inconsistency in the ad message during the past six months as part of the problem (AA, Oct. 7). J. Walter Thompson USA handles BK.
- Procter & Gamble's Folgers and General Foods' Maxwell House continued their game of hopscotch in the coffee category in October. This time, Maxwell House came out on top with 25.5% of first mentions, up 1.5 points from 24% in September. Folgers, which has held the top awareness spot for seven of the past ten months, dropped 3.2 points to 20.8%. General Foods' Sanka was No. 3 with 4.6%.
- Apple Computer again is losing ad-awareness ground in the computer category, slipping 3.8 points to 25.1% in October. That's below Apple's previous 1985 low point of 25.7% in August. Once again in the No. 2 spot is IBM, with a 16% share, up a scant 0.1 point from September's 15.9%. Commodore remained No. 3 with 5.4%, down 0.9 points from 6.3% in September.#

women could be classified as stereotypical housewives—married women, not in the labor force, with children under 18, according to Ithaca, N.Y.-based American Demographics.

Additionally, only 21 million American women (one in five) were fulltime homemakers in 1984, down from 27 million in 1970. The elderly now make up the largest segment of homemakers. By 1995, according to American Demographics, only 14% of women aged 45 or younger will be fulltime homemakers; 60% will be aged 55 or older.

"The home itself is in a period of becoming more important," said Better Homes & Gardens managing editor Kate Greer, "primarily because once people get home, they like to stay there; it gives them a sense of their own space and they're more interested in decorating and remodeling their space."

However, that renewed interest in hearth and home does not extend to cleaning up their space. "People for the first time are establishing priorities for housecleaning. As long as it's neat, they can live with the dust," Ms. Greer said.

When the dust and grime build beyond the tolerance level, consumers are reaching for heavy-duty, multipurpose cleaners rather than the old, reliable ammonia cleaner.

The switch is being felt in supermarkets, where sales of cleaning supplies for heavy housework, such as floor waxes that require hand scrubbing, have declined steadily. Sales of multipurpose cleaners that are mopped directly onto floors have increased. The biggest sellers now are convenience products, such as automatic toilet bowl cleaners, air fresheners and multipurpose liquid cleaners, according to a Green Bay, Wis.-based household-cleansers buyer.

For example, manufacturers' sales of automatic toilet bowl cleaners totaled $57 million in 1979 (all segments are stated in manufacturers' dollars). Last year, sales reached $112 million, up by an average annual rate of 14.8%. Consultants Charles Kline & Co., Fairfield, N.J., project sales to hit $162 million by 1989, a $100 million increase in a decade.

The leader among automatic toilet bowl cleaners is Drackett Co.'s Vanish Bowl Brite. The Cincinnati-based division of Bristol-Myers is No. 1 in the estimated $240 million segment, with a 30% share. Laurence, Charles & Free, New York, handles the estimated $4 million Vanish budget.

R.T. French Co., Rochester, N.Y., a subsidiary of London-based Reckitt & Colman, markets Bully, Bully Plus Blue and Bully Power automatic bowl cleaners, and Swish, a thick liquid toilet bowl cleaner. Bully, in total, has a 7% market share, and Swish has 5%. J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, handles Bully's estimated $4.6 million account.

William Esty Co. is the agency for Sani-Flush, marketed by New York-based American Home Products' Boyle-Midway division. Sani-Flush has a 10% share.

This year has been "extremely competitive," in part due to the large number of new-product entries, a Drackett spokesman said. "Consumers are getting away from using abrasive cleaners and brushes, seeking ways to substitute newer cleaners that cut cleaning time in half, and companies are coming up with those products."

Kline & Co. analyst Betsy Donovan said vinyl protectants, air fresheners, bathroom cleaners, carpet deodorizers and laundry detergents are among the fastest-growing product segments.

"All-purpose liquid cleaners also are picking up. Floor polishes and waxes are continuing to decline and all-purpose cleaners are replacing them," Ms. Donovan said.

"Quick" and "easy" appear to be the buzzwords among the new dual-purpose cleaners, and sprays are the most popular delivery system.

Dow Chemical Co., Indianapolis, which in January added the Texize division of Morton-Thiokol to its household-cleaners lineup, has introduced a bathroom cleaner version of its Fantastik multipurpose cleaner.

Also introduced this year was Texize's Pine Magic multipurpose cleaner, billed as the "power of a pine cleaner in a spray" in advertising created by Henderson Advertising, Greenville, S.C.

Economics Laboratories, New York, extended its successful Scrub Free heavy-duty bathroom cleaner brand to a kitchen cleaner and a toilet-bowl cleaner. Warwick Advertising, New York, handles.

Oakland, Cal.-based Clorox also jumped into the estimated $84 million spray cleaner segment with Tackle.

The product is positioned as the first disinfectant cleaner to contain bleach. Tv and magazine ads are from Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco.

However, Tackle does not contain pine oil, "still a marketing strong point," said Ms. Donovan.

Two of the market leaders in the $160 million pine-oil disinfectant category are Wayne, N.J.-based American Cyanamid's Pine-Sol and Lysol from Sterling Drug's Montvale, N.J.-based Lehn & Fink division. SSC&B, New York, is the Lysol agency.

Lehn & Fink expanded its Lysol franchise with Lysol Cling thick liquid toilet bowl cleaner, while American Cyanamid has concentrated on testing a Pine-Sol spray cleaner with ad support from Ted Bates Advertising/New York.

Jay Luttrell, homecare marketing research manager at S.C. Johnson & Son, Racine, Wis., points out that advertisers are going after a more "heterogeneous market" than in the past, when women were the primary target.

Advertisers have acknowledged that men are doing more of the weekly grocery shopping, and are trying different media schedules and using more direct mail to help influence their buying decisions, he said.#

Chicago editorial assistant Sara Stern also contributed to this article.

Pine oil market shares

Pine oil cleaner sales were spurred by the introduction this year of new spray bottle delivery systems. Although pine scents made a comeback this year, Procter & Gamble's lemon-scented Mr. Clean all-purpose cleaner remained the segment leader. Source: Advertising Age.

Blair

the divestitures, Mr. Fritz said.

Just how much Blair will realize from the sale of its printing and fsi operations is unclear. The three printing companies—American Printers & Lithographers and Alden Press in Chicago and Meehan-Tooker in East Rutherford, N.J.—had combined 1984 revenue of $272 million, $86 million of which was generated from printing the fsi, which has been operating at a loss.

Blair said it is negotiating with the respective management groups of these operations. Included are Robert Lifton, chairman of American, the sheet-fed operation; Jerome Spier, president of Alden and Meehan, the web presses, and Edward Fuhrman, chairman of John Blair Marketing, which publishes the fsi.

A company spokesman said outside offers will be entertained as well. For months, rumors have floated in the investment community that John Blair as a whole might be ripe for a takeover. The spokesman said he knew of no such offers, nor of any outside offers for the printing or fsi operations.

There is some speculation, however, that an outside offer for the fsi might come from Robert Hemm, former president of John Blair Marketing, who resigned a year ago in the first of several management shakeups. Jack Valentine, who sold Advo to Blair last year and who briefly succeeded Mr. Hemm, also is being mentioned as a possible buyer. Neither was available for comment.

Although Blair said it would retain Advo in the restructuring, there also was speculation Messrs. Hemm and/or Valentine might be interested in purchasing it. Blair decided to hold on to Advo, some observers say, only because it did not think it could recover its investment through a sale.

Completing the speculative circle, observers said last week that if Blair could sell off the printing, fsi and even Advo, Mr. Fritz would then be in a position to take the remaining broadcast operations private, thus preventing a possible takeover.

The restructuring announcement comes just 20 months after Blair acquired Hartford-based Advo-System, a direct-mail processing company, for $37 million, including acquisition costs. As of the end of last year, Blair had put another $72.5 million into Advo for expansion and capital, bringing its total investment in the company to about $110 million.

The purchase and cash requirements of Advo were largely responsible for boosting Blair's total outstanding debt at the end of last year to $302.9 million from $140.6 million the year before.#

Schlitz gets ad gusto

DETROIT—Stroh Brewery Co. will try to pump new gusto into its Schlitz brand beer next year with an expanded ad effort and a new agency, Vic Olesen & Partners, Los Angeles.

Olesen will develop a campaign with an as-yet-undetermined celebrity for use primarily in spot tv markets, said Tom Noble, Schlitz brand manager.

Creative will be developed by Olesen on a fee basis, and Stroh will buy media in-house, primarily on a co-op basis with distributors, Mr. Noble said.

Total ad spending is expected to be about $5 million in 1986. The new campaign probably will begin in the spring.

Schlitz sales have declined since a high of 13 million bbls. in 1978. Sales this year are expected to be 1.5 million bbls., a figure that Schlitz brand manager Tom Noble wants to stabilize in 1986.

Stroh took over Schlitz when it acquired the Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co. in 1982, but has made little marketing effort for the brand. While MCA Advertising, New York, has been agency of record, the only new ad effort in the last year was a Southwest regional one created by Point Communications, Dallas.

The Point Communications campaign used actor Larry Hagman as pitchman. Mr. Noble said Olesen's celebrity campaign will not use Mr. Hagman.#

Empty minute to give relief for Super viewers

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

NBC Sports will let the screen go dark for one minute during its Super Bowl XX pregame show and invite football fans to make a run for the refrigerator or the bathroom without missing any coverage of the spectacle.

Michael Weisman, NBC Sports executive producer, said the time out will not reduce the number of commercials in the Jan. 26 telecast. But it still could be construed as a costly giveaway, since pregame spots are selling for $275,000 to $300,000 per 30 seconds.

During the break, NBC will air music while the tv screen goes dark except for the "NBC Sports" logo and a clock in the lower right corner ticking off the seconds.

"I was going to use sound effects of toilets flushing and beer cans popping open, but I thought that would be a bit much," Mr. Weisman said."

Mr. Weisman, an innovator who once tested an announcerless football game on tv, said he took his intermission idea to NBC Sports president Arthur Watson. He said Mr. Watson agreed the break was needed. NBC's Super Bowl Sunday coverage is likely to last at least eight hours. It includes a college basketball game between the University of North Carolina and Notre Dame, the two-hour Super Bowl pregame show, the 3½-hour game telecast and a half-hour postgame show.

Mr. Weisman said advertisers as well as viewers will benefit from the intermission. Companies break new campaigns during the game and Mr. Weisman believes an early "time out" might keep more viewers in front of their sets while the commercials air.

"This may not be a cure [for people leaving the tv during spots] but it certainly will help," Mr. Weisman said. "If this intermission has positive results, why not extend it to two-hour prime time movies and other lengthy tv events?"

Initial advertiser reaction to the idea was lukewarm, however.

U.S. car makers drive away from Super Bowl

NEW YORK—U.S. auto companies are sitting out the network Super Bowl telecast for 1986.

For the first time in years, the single network automotive advertiser on the game will be a foreign company: Nissan Motor Corp. U.S.A., the No. 2 Japanese importer, which is feeling competitive pressure from American Honda Motor Co.

No U.S. maker picked up the domestic auto advertising exclusivity, though that does not rule out their presence in selected markets as spot advertisers. Ford division of Ford Motor Co. has one network spot in the pregame show.

"NBC couldn't count on the old faithfuls," said Ron Fredrick, senior vp, J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, who handles Ford media. Mr. Fredrick said traditional big sports advertisers thought NBC's price was too high.

He added, "When Chevy threw

down the gauntlet about the $1 million minute [last year], that may have had some impact on the market." The Super Bowl has become "symbolic of advertiser excess," Mr. Fredrick said, and many cost-conscious advertisers see it as one of the first places to cut back.

NBC announced the Super Bowl was "sold out" last week and that advertisers had paid its record $1.1 million per minute asking price, but it apparently did so selling mostly first-time Super Bowl advertisers. Many advertisers in ABC's Super Bowl XIX, at $1 million a minute, did not return. Most cited the excessive price of Super Bowl time.

NBC refused last week to reveal which advertisers are in the Jan. 26 telecast. Robert Blackmore, senior vp-sales, NBC-TV, when read last January's list of Super Bowl advertisers, said, "99% of those are

Ad prices up 30%, with audience guarantee

ABC's Olympics promise

By VERNE GAY

NEW YORK—ABC Sports has opened its 1988 Winter Olympics sales effort by giving audience guarantees for the first time ever in exchange for a 30% increase over 1984 to $325,000 per 30 seconds in prime time.

ABC is aiming at a take of $500 million for its Calgary winter games telecasts, more than double the $187 million sold for the 1984 Winter Games in Sarajevo, Yugoslavia. The 1988 winter target comes close to the 1984 Summer Games in Los Angeles, which generated revenues of $625 million.

NBC-TV has the rights to the 1988 Summer Games in Seoul, South Korea, and is expected to begin selling those games Dec. 5. Bertram Zeldin, the former head of NBC sports sales before moving over to head sports marketing at the network, has been brought back into sales to spearhead NBC's Olympics sales efforts.

ABC is taking some novel sales approaches to maximize commercial sales for the winter games. Along with giving household guarantees for the first time in Olympics broadcast history, ABC plans to sell franchise advertisers program vignettes called "Great Olympic Moments" as part of its over-all package. The vignettes, similar to newsbreaks, will be broadcast throughout 1987 in all dayparts.

ABC began a hurry-up offense in recent weeks after it became apparent NBC-TV would begin selling the 1988 Summer Games as early as next week. Observers believe ABC, which had delayed pitching advertisers on the winter games because of a lackluster sports sales market, was forced to act because of NBC's apparent bullishness on the Seoul Games. Both will be approaching the same list of advertisers.

The move is part of an effort by Castle & Cooke to equate the Dole brand name with fresh foods, as the company proceeds to market brand-name tomatoes, cucumbers, green peppers and citrus fruits (AA, Aug. 26).

The company estimates branded produce, mostly fruit, is a $2.5 billion-to-$4 billion segment of the $24 billion fresh produce category.

Bates tries French connection 3
Ted Bates Worldwide, convinced that the time is right for "experimentation" by ad agencies, has imported one of its joint ventures into the U.S. to form a creative specialty shop that reports directly to agency chairman Robert Jacoby. The new agency is called L'Entente Delacroix/New York, and its president and creative director is Michel Delacroix, who also heads a group of agencies and communications companies of the same name in France.

Tax changes win friends 3
If the House committee version of President Reagan's tax-reform program is approved by Congress and becomes law, advertising agencies will face a burdensome new accounting procedure. But over-all, agencies and clients would welcome a lowering of the corporate tax rate and have little to fear from proposed changes.

NEW YORK—Major changes in the slumping computer publishing field (AA, Oct. 10, et seq.) have scrambled the standings at the top.

Two top-10 magazines will not be around in 1986: McGraw-Hill Information Systems Co.'s Popular Computing, which was No. 7 in audited circulation as of last June, at 262,000, and Ziff-Davis Publishing Co.'s Creative Computing, No. 8 as of last June, at 250,000, though its average net paid circulation has been 300,000.

A third magazine, Hayden Publishing Co.'s Personal Computing, has slashed its '86 rate base 25.9%, to 400,000.

This means Scholastic Inc.'s Family Computing will move to first place among computer magazines. Its '86 rate base has been increased 9.3%, to 410,000.

Computer publications have been hit hard in advertising as well as circulation. Industry analysts expect the field to finish '85 with a decline in ad revenues of 10% to 20% and a decline in ad pages of 20% to 25%.

The slump also has affected other computer publications.

Ziff-Davis has sold its Cherry Hill, N.J.-based Data Decisions subsidiary, which publishes computer and communications systems newsletters, to McGraw-Hill, which will cease DD's operations and offer customers reports from its comparable Datapro Research Corp. And Ziff-Davis also folded its much-heralded "Computer Industry Daily" newsletter.

Not all the news in the field is bad. Some publishers are finding success with titles targeted to specific hardware and/or software. Lotus Development Corp. has posted a rate base of 300,000 for its magazine, LOTUS, which made its debut last May, good for fifth place among magazines in '86.

At right are estimates for magazines next year, compared with the standings as of last June. Source: "Marketing Technology" newsletter.#

Computer magazines

The demise of both Popular Computing, No. 7 this year in circulation/rate base, and Creative Computing, No. 8, will change the rankings of the 10 largest computer magazines in 1986. While the remaining eight from '85 all show up in the '86 top 10, some change ranks, and there is room for two newcomers, LOTUS and Commodore Microcomputers. NR means not ranked. Source: "Marketing Technology" newsletter, New York.

Sears centennial ads looking ahead

By LAURIE FREEMAN

CHICAGO—Sears, Roebuck & Co., celebrating its 100th birthday, is determined not to act its age. Rather than take a nostalgic look at its past, the nation's largest retailer had its agencies prepare advertising aimed at establishing Sears as the store of the future.

Ogilvy & Mather and Needham Harper Worldwide's Chicago offices share the company's $726.2 million merchandise division ad budget and are splitting the ad duties associated with the centennial celebration. O&M handles Sears' automotive, appliances and hard lines; Needham is the apparel and home-fashion merchandise agency.

O&M got the birthday party going Nov. 18 with the celebration's first network tv spot. It includes the umbrella "There's more for your life at Sears" theme, but unveiled Sears' "New Century" gold-tinted logo. Sears sources say the logo will appear "in some form" in all advertising throughout 1986, whether as a banner in tv spots and in print ads or included in the broadcast copy voiceover.

At the same time, Needham is said to be working on a non-sales-related, corporate-image campaign for the retailer that also will incorporate the New Century logo.

The centennial campaign is designed both to increase retail store traffic and to provide Sears with a slightly different forum in which to introduce more than 100 New Century products being added to the company's catalog and stores.

Sears' New Century items range from state-of-the-art consumer electronics to the latest in sportswear, including its new Stefanie Powers-endorsed line of women's career apparel (AA, Sept. 9); a no-splatter, gel-like paint that turns to liquid when applied by a roller; men's never-sag socks, and a wide-screen projection television set that allows viewing from any angle.

Additionally, sources say Sears is working on a national campaign that will promote the chain's "Store of the Future" renovations (AA, July 22). Sears expects approximately 250 of its nearly 1,000 stores to be remodeled by yearend, and is designing ads that tout those makeovers.#

Daily papers warm up to August

New York—The traditional end of summer, followed by newspapers' best advertising revenue period, turned out reasonably well for dailies in the 15 major markets that Media Records measures for the Advertising Age Flash Report.

Over-all, advertisers' August spending in 16 measured categories was up 7.2% to $260.2 million, over the same month last year.

Department stores led the increases, up 9.9% to $91.5 million; general-merchandise stores were up 21.2% to $41.2 million, and food stores up 9.7% to $28.1 million. Among other gainers were the radio-tv-phonographs-records category, up 21.2% to $17.4 million; passenger cars-new, up 57.1% to $15.6 million; airlines, up 3.6% to $7.8 million; banks and trust companies, up 1.4% to $4.5 million, and stock, bond and investment houses, up 29.6% to $1.26 million.

Losing categories included amusements, down 2.8% to $28.1 million; publishing and media, down 29.4% to $5.7 million; cigarets, down 2.4% to to $5.27 million; public service utilities and commissions, down 8.8% to $4.7 million; computer stores and supplies, down 4.4% to $3.8 million; computers, equipment and services, down 47.5% to $2.97 million; alcoholic beverages, down 7.1% to $1.99 million, and cameras, photo supplies and services, down 63.1% to $230,524.#

Care Bears to dish out ice cream

By JULIE FRANZ

Pierre's French Ice Cream, Cleveland, is testing a 30-second tv spot in northeast Ohio for its Care Bears Ice Cream, one of the greatest things in a pail since sand (AA, Oct. 17).

American Greetings' Those Characters from Cleveland and Pierre's teamed up to make Care Bears Ice Cream, a premium ice cream for children packaged in quart-and-a-half collectable plastic pails. Each pail depicts Care Bears creating the individual flavors, which include Peanut Buddy & Jam, Chewy Gooey Bubble Stuff, Cheer-ific Chocolate and Rockin' Rainbow. Suggested retail price is $3.29.

The tv spot shows candid photos of children enjoying the ice cream, set to "bold classical music," said Shelley Roth, Pierre vp. The commercial will break before Christmas in the remainder of Care Bears Ice Cream markets, airing in Saturday morning and after-school time slots. Care Bears Ice Cream also will be featured in ads for Pierre's French Ice Cream, the company's major product.

Radio, newspaper and couponing also support. Ads are handled in-house.

Distribution, which began in Cleveland and the Midwest, is going strong as the product fights for space in the overcrowded freezer case. Leaning on the success of the Care Bears name, the ice cream has gained distribution in Denver, Florida, Central Illinois, Michigan, Ohio and Seattle less than a month after its introduction, Ms. Roth said.

Pierre's is counting on Care Bears Ice Cream to help it expand distribution of it Pierre's French.

The Care Bear product is one of the first premium, novelty ice creams designed for children. Despite the abundance of cheaper ice cream alternatives, Pierre's thinks parents will pay more for an all-natural product for the children, said Jennifer Yutrzenka, marketing and advertising manager for Pierre's.#

Giacobazzi ads back under new importer

By WILLIAM F. GLOEDE

Yonkers, N.Y.—After picking up import rights to Giacobazzi wines six weeks ago, Park Benziger & Co. is breaking the brand's first radio ads in two years in New York, and it plans to return to tv early next year with a multimarket campaign.

Giacobazzi, when handled by Wine Imports Co., was supported by a $2.2 million spot tv campaign in 1982, the last year it was backed with any significant consumer advertising. The import rights went to Renfield Importers in 1983, when support dropped to $216,000 in magazines, according to Leading National Advertisers. In 1984, LNA shows no activity for Giacobazzi.

Despite the lack of support, the Italian brand held on to its No. 9 position in the imported table wine category, with depletions of 775,000 9-liter cases in 1984, according to the 1985 "Impact American Wine Market" review and forecast. But sales are falling; Park Benziger projects sales of 691,000 cases of white, red and rose' in 1985.

Beginning early next year, Park Benziger plans to restore consumer spending to 1982 levels, with ads slated for spot tv, radio, print and point of purchase. The company is presently in negotiations with an Italian actor who will promote the brand in a series of humorous tv and radio spots, according to Janda Lee, director of marketing and pr. She would not identify the actor.

Keller Haver Advertising, New York, already has created the radio spots and p.o.p. materials.#

This data has been provided by Media Records for exclusive publication in Advertising Age and may not be reprinted or published in any form without explicit permission from Media Records. All newspapers represented are subscribers to Media Records. For those newspapers that subscribe to Media Records National Advertising Reporting Service, Total Advertising data shown has been supplied by the publisher to Media Records and included in this compilation. All publisher supplied figures are converted to MRCS SAU inches by Media Records. These newspapers are indicated with an asterisk (*).

REPORTING METHODOLOGY

Media Records continues to measure in linage but due to the introduction of the SAU 6 column format Media Records has designed and developed a methodology with the approval of our subscribers, the INAME Measurements Committee, The ANPA NAB Working Committee, The AAAA Newspaper Committee, and other industry groups.

The approved methodology is titled The Media Records Conversion System (MRCS) and is based upon the printed page area of each product of the newspaper and is a five step approach as follows:

1. Measure Printed Page
   Width and Depth in inches
2. Determine Square Inches of Page
   Multiply Width by Depth Inches
3. Determine the Number of SAU Inches of Page
   Divide the Square Inches by 2.0625 (SAU Inches)
4. Measure the Total Lines of the Page
   Multiply Column Depth Agate Lines by the Number of Columns on the Page
5. Determine the Factor for Converting Measured Lines to Reported SAU Inches

Kay Koplovitz

A cable innovator whose legendary bouts at the negotiating table foresaw a revolution

By Craig Reiss

While Muhammad Ali was toe-to-toe with Smokin' Joe Frazier, bringing the Thrilla in Manila to a knockout close in 1975, Kay Koplovitz was stateside thrilling to the marvel of Home Box Office's breakthrough satellite transmission of the fight from the Philippines. As the lights went out for Joe Frazier, the dawn was rising on cable tv.

Koplovitz at that time was already a veteran of the fledgling cable tv field. She had graduated several years earlier from Comsat and had paid her dues in the cable trenches while with UA/Columbia. There she handled problems related to cable franchise applications.

On her own as a communications consultant, Koplovitz had done some publicity for HBO's coverage of the Ali-Frazier classic, and on the night of the fight she assembled a select group of cable industry and government leaders to witness the live cablecast from the other side of the globe.

With each jab and straight right Ali threw, Koplovitz watched as the wonder of satellite communications captured the imaginations of the cable leaders. Almost immediately after the fight, major cable systems operators—Time Inc.'s American Television Corp., TeleCommunications Inc. and UA/Columbia among them—ordered receiving dishes for their franchises.

"That's what I had been waiting for," Koplovitz recalls. She had written her master's thesis on the inevitable coming of age of the communications satellite. She had gone to work at Comsat because she knew the satellite age was just around the corner. Then Ali kayoed Frazier. The wait was over.

Bob Rosencrans, who then headed UA/Columbia and who had given Kay Koplovitz her start in cable, was one of those leaders inspired by the Ali-Frazier transmission. He had cable systems with 12 or 24 channels, and precious little programing to offer his viewers besides HBO and local broadcasting stations. But he had a brainstorm.

HBO had the contract to carry Madison Square Garden's sports events, but Rosencrans figured it wouldn't renew the deal. HBO was moving toward becoming a motion-picture-dominated service, and regional sports programing—even with the Garden's marquee value—probably would play no role in its new format. What if UA/Columbia took over the Garden contract and set up a network to carry the events to cable systems such as his?

Rosencrans called Koplovitz.

"I said, 'Yeah, let's do it,' and when HBO did pass on renewing with Madison Square Garden, [Garden president] Joe Cohen and I made the deal," says Koplovitz.

In 1977, that deal gave birth to another new concept, the basic cable network. And USA Network was the first of its kind. Then, as now, Kay Koplovitz, the childhood speed skater from Milwaukee turned communications technology expert, was its president.

If for no other reason, Koplovitz would be noteworthy as the only cable network chief (other than, perhaps, Ted Turner) who has survived nine years of tumultuous cable tv history. But Koplovitz, like Turner, has done more than survive.

Kay Koplovitz started USA Network in 1977, and besides Ted Turner is the only person to head a basic cable network for nine straight years. She began USA as a mom-and-pop operation, carrying mostly live sports events, then steered it through a transition period when it switched predominantly to entertainment. (Photo by Arnold Adler)

She and her network weathered the onslaught of giant cable competitors such as CBS, ABC, RCA and Westinghouse, who rushed in with grand ideas and then either folded their tents or refashioned their visions. During the period when cynics were calling cable little more than a vacuous hype factory, she steered USA Network through another wrenching period. When sports became economically prohibitive, she led USA into entertainment. She lasted through the sale and resale of the network and has remained at its helm during the last four years, with USA owned by Paramount, MCA and Time Inc. —partners in USA Network and rivals in everything else. She held their trust even during the extremely lean years of the early 1980s, when cable revenues never came close to covering the cost of rapid expansion. And she has emerged as the leader of a viable and growing business.

USA Network is privately held, and Koplovitz would not discuss its revenues or profitability—though it is indeed turning a profit. But there are other measures that tell of USA Network's success. It has some 6,500 affiliates. It counts among its clients most of the major advertisers in the country. And for the past 18 months, A.C. Nielson Co. measurements show it is the most-watched basic cable network.

It wasn't always like that.

"I remember when we introduced USA Network in 1977 at a cable convention in Chicago," she says. "I'm sure a number of people thought this is a crazy idea, taking the Garden events out of the Garden. But playing the Garden was big time, so it actually was a terrific sales and marketing niche to be able to say we had live events from the Garden."

Madison Square Garden events, which included New York hockey and basketball along with boxing matches, filled in the USA Network prime time schedule in the winter and spring, but the summer lineup was vacant. In one of her first programing moves as a network chief, Koplovitz struck a deal with the New York Yankees to begin carrying their games nationally.

"We actually carried a game in 1978," she says. "It was a Yankees-Boston Red Sox game, and it lasted something like 17 innings. It was a great game, as exciting as one could ever hope for, but it was our first venture outside the Garden and we were totally unprepared to deal with it. It was all very exciting, though, until the next day when [Major League Baseball commissioner] Bowie Kuhn called."

Kuhn had been alerted that a Yankee game was being cablecast across the country, a violation of league rules. Kuhn told Koplovitz that the Yankees had no right to sell her the game and have it carried outside the New York area. Only the league could make that deal, he said.

"So, not wanting to miss a beat, I said to Kuhn, 'Well, then give me the contract for all of Major League Baseball.' And what had been perceived as a blatant violation of league rules is what led us to make a deal with Major League Baseball," she says.

Turning adversity into opportunity would remain a constant theme in Koplovitz' career, especially during the first four years when USA Network's prime time fare was predominantly live sports programing. She was trailblazing then. She also demonstrated what would become known as her benchmark strength, negotiating. Koplovitz has an uncanny knack for sizing up the marketplace and an entrepreneur's eye for finding ways to create something that did not exist before.

Within months of inking the baseball deal, Koplovitz and USA Network also had exclusive cable contracts with the National Basketball Assn. and the National Hockey League.

"Kay's sports negotiations are legendary," says Jeff Lawenda, who was sales and programing chief of USA Network in the early days and now is co-founder of Chelsea Communications in New York. "She had an incredible sensitivity to the supply and demand of the marketplace. She knew where to start a negotiation and where to end it, what she wanted to come away with. Sports rights are extremely difficult to negotiate, but Kay made everybody walk away smiling, even though they knew they gave up something."

In the baseball deal, Koplovitz was quick to realize MLB's own marketing dilemma, and was just as quick to calculate how an upstart cable network could fit into solving the problem.

"Baseball had been struggling at that time with how to equitably distribute the games, particularly outside the team's territory," she says. "Before cable, if you lived outside a major city, you did not receive baseball on tv except for the game of the week."

Putting the games on cable would bring baseball to the hinterlands, especially since few major urban markets were wired yet. And since cable still had limited distribution, baseball did not have to worry about overexposure. The fit was perfect, and baseball became USA Network's most popular programing.

The next target was the NBA.

"She had an incredible sense for what the industry was, and what it might become," says NBA commissioner David Stern, who in 1979 negotiated the basket-

Industry works to improve fuzzy image

By Don Veraska
and Len Strazewski

Even though it is more than 20 years old, cable tv still is trying to focus in on its niche in communications and advertising. Revenues and geographic reach continue to grow, but cable tv's over-all image is fuzzy.

One reason for the image problem is cable's major market penetration, which lags behind the national average.

By the end of 1985, cable tv will have reached an estimated 39 million households, or 45.7% of all households having tv sets. But in the top 10 U.S. tv markets, nearly 70% of the 7.4 million households don't have access to cable.

Despite these difficulties in major markets, the industry's annual revenues are estimated to be $8.3 billion in 1985 and projected to top $16 billion by 1990, according to industry observers.

Ad revenue, according to industry newsletter "Cable TV Advertising," published by media consulting company Paul Kagan Associates, Carmel, Cal., also is growing, up 32% to about $735 million in 1985. By 1990, ad revenues are projected to exceed $2.7 billion.

However, ad agencies still view cable as a second-class buy. Major agencies generally spend no more than 5% of their media budgets on cable buys and frequently less, says Ronald Kaatz, senior vp and director of media concepts at J. Walter Thompson USA in Chicago.

"The bread and butter medium is still broadcast television," he says, "and when broadcast network prices are soft, cable is a tough sell to media buyers."

Agencies, however, are using cable more for clearly targeted approaches, he says. "We are using cable either for a different creative approach or to fill in audience deficiencies."

Cable penetration may be low in major markets, but frequently the areas that are penetrated are affluent suburbs that make good target audiences, Mr. Kaatz says.

Bob Alter, president of the Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau, Washington, agrees. "Many advertisers recognize that much of an area's real buying power is in its suburbs, so cable advertising has been growing at pretty close to expectations.

"However, as cable further penetrates center cities of the major markets, it can only be a plus," he says.

Of the top 10 tv markets in the U.S., six remain partially or totally uncabled. They are New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit and Washington. Cost is one reason these major urban areas lag behind in providing cable. Paul Kagan Associates estimates that installing the 27,900 miles of wiring to connect the homes in major uncabled urban areas would cost $3 billion.

Another reason dates to cable's beginning. The original intent of cable was to transmit commercial broadcast tv service —programs from the big cities— to isolated areas that could not receive tv signals, either because of their distance from transmitters or topography.

Then, as cable expanded, service went first to the wealthier suburban areas in which cable operators saw greater profit potential.

The cities lagged behind these other areas in cable construction both because of the long and often politically complicated process of awarding franchises worth millions of dollars and because underground construction, often necessary in downtown areas, was far more expensive.

When contracts were awarded, winning applicants often sought major contract concessions, resulting in time-consuming bargaining or litigation.

Statistics on cable coverage for metropolitan areas can be deceiving because measurements often include heavily cabled suburbs. In yet-to-be-cabled Washington, for instance, the 27% penetration figure includes suburban Maryland and Virginia, according to the CAB.

Here's a status report on the availability of cable in the top 10 U.S. tv markets, according to the research of Paul Kagan Associates, the CAB and others.

New York

Much of Manhattan has been served by cable since 1970, but construction has just begun on Warner Amex Cable Communications systems in Brooklyn and Queens.

Two Manhattan franchises rank among the top 30 systems in the nation, according to CableVision, a Denver-based trade publication. American Television & Communications Corp.'s Manhattan franchise has about 207,000 subscribers, and the Group W Cable franchise has about 100,000.

Litigation continues to hold up construction in the Bronx and Staten Island, although contracts have been awarded to CATV Enterprises and Manhattan Cable.

Cable has a 38.3% penetration in the New York designated market area as of July, according to the CAB. Long Island is a big cable market and one local franchise, Woodbury-based Cablevision Systems Development, is the nation's second largest system with more than 241,000 subscribers, according to CableVision. Another local franchise from Viacom Cablevision, based in Central Islip, has about 100,000 subscribers.

Los Angeles

In the Los Angeles-Palm Springs market, penetration was 35.8% in July, the CAB reports.

However, the city's auction process, designed to force vendors, including Falcon Communications with more than 88,000 subscribers and Valley Cable TV with about 56,000 subscribers, to provide service to uncabled areas, was thrown out early this year by a federal appeals court in a precedent-setting decision, according to Kagan.

The case, originally brought by Preferred Communications, a frustrated franchise seeker, was appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which has agreed to hear the case. In the meantime, several areas of the city, including Watts and other low-income areas, remain uncabled.

Chicago

After much political maneuvering and the collapse of several locally financed companies, construction has begun in four of five franchising areas.

Two areas are operated by Group W Cable of Chicago and three other area franchises are held by local companies with investment from TCI. Some 50,000 homes now have cable service for about 25.8% penetration in the dma as of July.

Full service, however, is several years away. Cable construction has yet to begin in the high-rent district fronting Lake Michigan after Continental Cablevision sold its interest in a local franchise holder to Tele-Communications last January.

Philadelphia

Although contracts have been signed by the four cable franchisees, Greater Philadelphia Cablevision, Wade Communications, Rollins Cablevision of Philadelphia and Comcast Cable of Philadelphia, construction won't begin until March or April, according to the city's cable administrator Vince Costello.

However, the area surrounding the city is a strong cable market with 46.4% penetration, according to the CAB.

San Francisco

San Francisco's hilly terrain necessitated construction years ago, making the dma one of the nation's most heavily cabled with a 47.7% penetration, according to the CAB. San Francisco's largest franchise, Viacom, has about 89,000 subscribers. No new wiring is planned.

Boston

Some subscribers are being served and construction is under way in other areas even though the cable operator, Cablevision, continues to negotiate.

As with other major markets, however, the subburbs are strong and cable has a 44.7% penetration in the area. Warner Amex's operation in Malden, Mass., has more than 63,000 subscribers, CableVision reports.

Detroit

In 1983, Barden Communications was awarded the Detroit franchise, but the cable company continues to try to put together a financial package, and constuction has yet to begin. When including the suburbs, cable has a 34.4% penetration, according to the CAB.

Dallas-Fort Worth

Warner Amex Cable sold its 5-year-old dual-cable system in Dallas to Heritage Communications in June, but the system's coverage remains sparse, at some 25%, with about 80,000 subscribers. Some construction remains in Fort Worth, served by Sammons Communications, which has about 59,000 subscribers.

The CAB places cable penetration in the Metroplex at 38.8%.

Washington

A 54-channel system to be operated by a local group, District Cablevision, is expected to begin construction next spring. Completed wiring of 250,000 houses is expected in five years.

Tele-Communications Inc., the nation's largest cable company with about 3.7 million subscribers in the U.S., is a majority financial partner in the project, but operating control will remain with the local company.

Houston

Houston has largely completed its two-franchise system, awarded five years ago to Storer Cable Communications and Warner Amex.

The larger Warner Amex franchise ranks sixth among cable systems nationally with about 185,000 subscribers, according to CableVision. The smaller franchise ranks out of the top 100.

Total cable penetration for the dma is 41.7%, according to the CAB.

The 11th market

Cleveland, which slipped a notch in 1985 to become the nation's 11th largest tv market, finally has awarded a bid to a local cable group, North Coast Cable, but the city still is negotiating a final contract and seeking financing. It will take several years, at least, before any substantial cable service begins.

However, the suburbs and Akron are strong cable markets and total area penetration is 47.5%, according to the CAB.

The slow but steady gains in major market penetration should yield corresponding gains for the cable industry.

Spot cable hopes to connect with interconnects

By Kevin Brown

If you're hot, you're going to sell spot. That's a tv industry truism.

By that measure, though, cable tv is cold. Spot advertising sales have been a weak link in cable advertising, representing 15.7% of the $545 million spent on all cable advertising in 1984.

Industry executives say spot sales, which make up slightly more than 1% of the $8 billion in total cable revenues, should be 5% of revenues, and they have taken steps to reach that goal.

These steps include consolidating more local systems into interconnects, which permit local ad insertion on network feed-ins; developing local market studies to more accurately gauge cable viewership, and stepping up trade promotion.

Spot cable ad sales have not been completely stagnant, however. In 1984, they jumped to $85.7 million for a 70% increase over the previous year. Projections for 1985 are $128.9 million, or a 50.4% increase. Much of that growth is attributed to the cable interconnect.

The interconnect joins cable systems to sell advertising by market rather than by system, offering some or all of the average two minutes an hour ad-supported cable networks allocate for local use.

Interconnects are either "hard" or "soft." In a hard (microwave) interconnect, advertisers need supply only one tape of the commercial. In a soft interconnect, a tape for each system may be required. The soft interconnects send the tapes with simultaneous traffic orders.

Most of the top markets are included in the 55 interconnects in operation in 1984, up from 38 in 1983. One of those new systems was CBS CableConnect system in Chicago. The Chicago interconnect serves 11 of 15 systems in the suburbs. Two of the systems CBS does not serve have no commercial insertion capabilities. Most of the city is not yet wired for cable.

CBS pays each system $2 per subscriber per year for the rights to sell 30% of each system's available ad time. CBS has contracted to sell 40% of available ad time in two years. Like most interconnects, CBS inserts only on the four major ad-supported cable networks: MTV:Music Television, Cable News Network, ESPN and USA Network.

When CBS began the interconnect in April, 1984, CableConnect served 90,000 subscribers. Subscribers now have increased to more than 400,000, representing an $800,000 annual cost for CBS. Use of the interconnect's microwave hardware, owned by Centel Video Path in McCook, Ill., costs CBS about $500,000 a year.

The interconnect keeps all revenues from ad time it sells. Spots go for $50 to $250 for a 30-second commercial, according to Jeffrey Jacobs, general sales manager, CBS CableConnect.

CBS CableConnect sells ad time for 11 of 15 cable systems in the suburbs of Chicago.

Mr. Jacobs expects total revenues this year of about $500,000, equal to an anticipated net loss of about $500,000.

Although it may appear that CBS-TV is competing with its CableConnect subsidiary—both are vying for ad dollars in the Chicago market where 80% of the suburbs are wired and where 71% of all retail sales occur—Mr. Jacobs says this is not so.

"It's a new baby compared to a grandfather," he says. "This is a way for CBS to hedge its bet, like Kellogg putting another cereal on the market, hoping it will take more market share away from another cereal maker."

CableConnect is running an ad campaign through December in the local business press and business pages of local newspapers with headlines reading: "The best way into the best homes" and "Use the power of cable tv in its simplest form." Part of the copy reads: "This enables you to saturate simultaneously more than 400,000 cable households with a single stroke. One order. One tape. One invoice."

In his message to potential advertisers, Mr. Jacobs stresses cable advertising's low cost. "A marketer can cost effectively dominate the medium with lack of clutter." Advertisers also get the benefit of subscriber growth in their contracts. Because subscriber levels are growing, an annual commitment by an advertiser provides greater viewership at the end of the commitment than at the beginning.

"To use cable effectively, advertisers should buy a rotation of spots throughout the day," Mr. Jacobs says. "Since the average unit rate is less than tv, they could buy from 15 to 42 spots and dominate the medium."

Some spot cable is sold nationally for local systems or interconnects. For example, between 10% and 15% of CableConnect's sales are through Cable Networks Inc.

CNI, a New York-based subsidiary of 3M Co., represents interconnects in 20 of the top 25 markets, or 12.47 million of the nation's 38.96 million subscribers.

Five-year-old CNI expects revenues of $14 million this year. The company has built itself by representing other interconnects and, in new markets such as New York and Atlanta, creating its own interconnects.

In Atlanta, CNI spent nearly $400,000 installing insertion equipment in 12 local systems in exchange for five-year representation rights.

Program guides fail to turn on advertisers

By Mark Bittman

It sounds like the answer to an advertiser's prayers—a medium that reaches select, upscale consumers who zap commercials, watch movies on videocassette recorders or tune in commercial-free tv.

And the medium maintains its ad message in these prime households 30 days or more.

Sounds like magic? That's the way the publishers of cable viewer guides promote their products. But despite these attributes, cable guides aren't making it in the competition for national advertising or for cable operator acceptance.

Cable tv audiences should be good advertising targets. They spend a minimum of $10 each month for basic service, and many spend three and four times that amount for premium channels, indicating willingness to use disposable income for entertainment.

And cable operators should be good markets because they all have schedules that need to be communicated.

Yet two national cable guides have folded in the past two years, and only one cable guide has been successful in attracting national advertising. Even that magazine, the Horsham, Pa.-based Cable Guide, published by TVSM, has just begun to sell advertising to its fullest potential, executives say.

The digest-size Cable Guide next month will introduce a new rate base circulation of 6 million, 70% of which is in the country's top 30 markets. The magazine is distributed by more than 500 cable system operators.

Most publications with that kind of rate base would not have trouble generating advertising, but cable guides are unusual creatures, says Robert Dallas, TVSM's national ad manager.

"We didn't even go after Madison Avenue until we had 3.5 million subscribers," he says. This year, the publication's first actively pursuing national accounts, advertisers include Philip Morris Inc., American Telephone & Telegraph, Eastman Kodak, Mitsubishi, the Magnavox division of North American Philips Corp., General Foods and General Electric. "We'll [illegible] million to $6 million this year in consumer advertising," Mr. Dallas says.

Cable Guide, which charges $49,500 for a four-color inside page, also estimates it will receive about $4 million in pay tv ads and about $1 million in advertising from cable networks.

Cable Guide goes to press every month with 52 pages of color, an amount comparable to TV Guide. The magazine also will start using perfect binding next month.

TVSM is by far the most successful of the handful of national publishers. Some of the cable guides have no national or local advertising and many lack the slick look preferred by big advertisers.

Many guides would like to follow Cable Guide's lead, but the cable publications business is very competitive.

Premium Channels is distributed as a bill stuffer, one of the several forms cable guides take.

"Most research indicates that there are at least 2½ sources of programing information available to the average cable household," says Lou Pirnik Jr., director of marketing for TV Host, a cable guide publisher based in Harrisburg, Pa. These sources include an operator-provided cable guide, TV Guide and the local newspaper.

Cable guides come in a variety of forms, including single magazines designed for a national audience such as Cable Guide, customized publications designed for specific systems such as TV Host and bill stuffers such as the new Premium Channels by Premium Channels Publishing Co., Bayshore, N.Y.

An increasing number of guides are sold, rather than given, to subscribers.

"This industry defies ultimate description," Mr. Pirnik says.

TV Host is available in three formats from which the operator can choose, varying in size and editorial content. TV Host has a circulation of about 1.3 million. Advertisers can segment their buys by cable system for about $24 per 1,000 circulation. However, the magazine is just beginning to see some national advertising, Mr. Pirnik says.

CableView, a New York-based publisher, has stayed alive by customizing its publications for individual operators.

CableView prints everything: Bill stuffers, a magazine-style guide for Storer Communications in New York (a multiple system operator with 1.5 million cable subscribers nationally) and a four-color, all-glossy extravaganza for Colony Communications, an mso in Providence, R.I., with 213,000 subscribers.

The company publications have a combined circulation of 5.3 million, including bill stuffers with no feature editorial content, and charges about $20 per 1,000 circulation.

Jerry Lyonnaise, Colony's national sales manager, says the magazine "helps us in marketing our premium services" because a top-of-the-page grid displays the premium channel schedule. "And we know subscribers are using it because they're paying for it."

About a quarter of Colony's basic subscribers and more than half of the premium subscribers take the magazine, and Mr. Lyonnaise says Colony is pleased and sticking with it. "We used to mail out four guides to some customers," creating logistical problems and high postage costs. "We are now making some money on the magazine."

That's the goal of every operator and publisher, and most believe the prospects in the field are good.

"Why was Time Inc. ready to spend $110 million?" asks Mr. Dallas, referring to the media conglomerate's TV-Cable Week, a weekly that ceased publication last year after losing nearly $50 million in its short life. "They were after a huge market."

The demise of TV-Cable Week was a shock to the cable guide industry; the publication had one of the greatest launches in history, with lots of promotion and lots of promise. But the operators didn't buy it, and 18

Mark Bittman is a frequent contributor to Special Report.

Tom Sassos, CNI vp-general manager, sees spot cable adding another dimension to tv advertising. "Cable provides a possibility for the local retailer to be on tv for the first time," he says.

National and local advertisers that traditionally have used tv apply national and local tv marketing principles to cable. But cable has opened what Mr. Sassos calls "the grass-roots level of cable advertising," attracting a third level of advertiser.

For example, instead of buying spot time in the most expensive market in the country, a retail advertiser 80 miles outside Manhattan can use spot cable to reach more localized areas. Mr. Sassos says these local retailers could make up as much as half of the spot cable industry this year.

Even after attracting local retailers, spot cable must develop further to claim more of the ad pie, Mr. Sassos says. "The industry is young and needs time to grow, add insertion capabilities to systems and organize into interconnects."

Spot cable also needs to refine its selling angle, and CNI has a formula that advises media planners how much money they should set aside for spot cable.

Chief component of the so-called CNI budgetary formula is the more upscale cable viewers who watch less broadcast tv.

"If cable viewers represent 30% of the tv viewers in San Francisco, and those viewers are 50% more upscale and over-all broadcast viewership is lower in cable households than elsewhere, then marketers should be filling in the gaps with a larger cable budget," Mr. Sassos says.

"The whole point of the formula is to bring cable into the planning process," according to Karen Klein, CNI marketing manager. Advertisers traditionally have been spending only extra media dollars for cable. Ms. Klein says you "can't build a business with leftover dollars."

Getting media buyers to accept the formula and buy spot cable is "like pulling teeth," Mr. Sassos says.

A new A.C. Nielsen Co. monitoring service, Local Cable Index, will monitor local cable viewership and may help reinforce the spot cable argument.

The service also may help the next step in the cable planning process: Giving buyers demographic information on networks and their availabilities.

Interconnects have another possible growth area: Systems can expand capabilities to insert on other ad-supported networks. But Mr. Sassos says interconnects have to sell the time they have first. Once that time is sold, the choice of networks probably will depend on the market. In Atlanta, The Nashville Network is popular. But in New York, Lifetime may be a better choice.

For now, most interconnects offer the four core ad-supported networks—with some local variation—while other systems install equipment, organize their markets and sell time. With cable viewers representing 6% of the national tv viewing audience, cable reps will be busy as spot sales heat up.

months after the magazine's death, the publication remains an active topic of conversation.

"If TV-Cable Week flew," Mr. Pirnik says, "we could have coattailed their efforts. We were excited that Time was making a major commitment to this industry and were hurt that they went belly up in less than six months."

"Their major mistake," Mr. Dallas says, "was that they thought the thing could be consumer-driven and turned their backs on the operator. Their first cover featured a network show!"

Operators were also resistant because they expected the Time Inc.-controlled pay channel Home Box Office to be favored over competing channels.

The cost, about $30 a year, was too high for the operators to bear and too difficult to pass on to subscribers. More successful products, such as Colony's CableView, cost subscribers only $1 a month, which includes a small profit for the operator.

Industry leaders weren't very surprised by the October announcement that Atlanta-based Cox Communications, the fourth largest mso with 1.5 million subscribers, was suspending publication of On Cable magazine with the December issue.

On Cable was an exception to most cable guides, and its editor and publisher, Peter Funt, struggled to differentiate the 8½-by-11-in. On Cable from other cable guides by paying greater attention to consumer needs and features.

In an interview six months ago, Mr. Funt said, "We don't consider ourselves to be in the cable guide business." Though the magazine functioned as a guide, he said, "We're in the consumer magazine business. Others simply supply printed material to cable operators; they see advertising as gravy, but remain in the marketing support business."

Now Mr. Funt says he was wrong. The cable guide industry isn't "the magazine business, but something else; you have to make it not only with the public and the advertisers, but in this other strange arena, with the cable operators."

On Cable's circulation peaked at nearly 1.5 million, but five years after the magazine's 1980 birth, the competition was getting tougher. "Five years ago," Mr. Funt says, "you could convince operators to spend 50 cents a month for a quality magazine. But the whole mood has changed, and those same people —or, more likely, their successors—want to pay 15 cents, or do without a guide altogether."

Also, On Cable never broke into the New York market, an area that would have helped solidify its position as a marketing tool, industry sources say.

Competing publishers also say On Cable's consumer-oriented approach alienated operators. For example, On Cable panned Cable News Network for firing veteran journalist Daniel Schorr. "This turned off the operators," Mr. Dallas says, "and had little value to the consumer, who doesn't know what ancillary services like CNN are anyway."

Consumers need and want a guide, Mr. Dallas says. "They connect the guide to the service," he says. "Their mental connection is 'This is the cable system telling me what's on this month.' And our research shows that they want more information on the cable service. They're confused, deluged and want to understand what the services are. They want an easy-to-use guide."

TV Host's Mr. Pirnik agrees. "The cable guide is to cable service as a telephone book is to a telephone. It's provided as part of the service, and it encourages subscribers to use the service."

On Cable's other major problem was its cost. Though Mr. Funt was proud of his $5,000 covers and professional copy, the operators, even those selling subscriptions, were tentative about committing to an expensive product. While ad pages were increasing with national advertisers such as R.J. Reynolds Industries, American Express and Citibank, the magazine couldn't sell enough national ads to to break even, Mr. Funt says.

On Cable charged about $20,000 for a four-color inside page on a rate base of 1.4 million.

"You cannot have a cable guide that isn't profitable," Mr. Pirnik says. "Maybe that's an oversimplification, but a lot of people in this industry have lost track of that. Ultimately, despite Cox's capital, On Cable cost too much to produce."

As the shakeout in cable guides continues, both operators and advertisers can expect some bargains, though advertisers will not be likely to find many prospects with large national circulations.

One potentially attractive cable guide strategy is the network that offers advertisers several options from a broad geographic base. The Cable TV Magazine Network in New York, for example, links 16 cable guides and tv publications and has nearly as big a rate base as Cable Guide, says sales manager Harvey Oshinsky.

Even the smaller Cable TV Guide Network offers a rate base of 2 million by tying together the guides for many msos. The Cable TV Guide Network charges about $19,000 for a four-color inside page.

Using networks means understanding more than circulation numbers, Mr. Oshinsky says.

"You can really pinpoint by using them [cable guides]; the whole New York area of dominant influence may not be as important to an advertiser as one particular segment of it," and, by advertising in one guide that serves one system, advertisers can hit the desired segment, he says.

National advertisers, however, seem not to have a clear idea of how cable guides can be used in this way, publication executives say. Until they do, cable guides as an advertising market remain more promise than practice.

C-P shifts favor regional approach

Move to global marketing slows

By NANCY GIGES

As part of a revised global marketing program, Colgate-Palmolive Co., New York, has realigned $50 million worth of advertising among its three key agencies.

Instead of moving toward worldwide brand assignments, Young & Rubicam, Ted Bates Advertising and Foote, Cone & Belding each will now serve as "lead agency" for Colgate's core brands in key regions around the world.

Young & Rubicam gains an estimated $40 million in C-P business, to about $120 million worldwide, and becomes the lead agency in Europe. Foote, Cone & Belding remains at about $90 million and will concentrate in Latin America, and Ted Bates Advertising stays at about $100 million, with a focus in the Far East.

All three shops keep a strong base of C-P business in the U.S.

The shift to a regional rather than worldwide brand alignment strategy stems from the company's realization that it must approach global marketing more slowly than it had intended.

Previously core brands had been assigned to the three agencies without regard to coordination across borders. Now each agency is responsible for a C-P brand assignment within a specific region. This is different from the strategy followed by arch-rival Procter & Gamble, which assigns brands on a country-by-country basis.

Clay Timon, who joined C-P a year ago as vp-director of worldwide advertising after 20 years of international agency experience, said, "What I've discovered coming into this job is that a global realignment is not physically possible. The simple fact is that everywhere we do business, there isn't a single agency that operates everywhere we are."

Mr. Timon said C-P's new lead agencies, in addition to handling the biggest budget in their respective areas, are also responsible for taking the lead in developing strategies in advertising that can be used on a broader than single-country basis.

He has not given up hope for a global approach one day but has realized the process

P&G makes muffins its main mixes

By JULIE FRANZ and LAURIE FREEMAN

Procter & Gamble reportedly intends to deemphasize standard cake mixes, a market it leads, in favor of "finger foods" such as brownie and muffin mixes.

Such a move would appear to leave the cake-mix field open for General Mills, which this month is introducing regionally a four-item Cake Lover's Collection line under its Betty Crocker banner. The Minneapolis company's new mixes include dehydrated fruit, nuts and chocolate packaged separately to produce "chunkier" cakes.

Retailers say Cincinnati-based P&G is telling them it will concentrate on introducing new "premium" home-baking items and stay away from further expansion of its standard cake-mix lines.

P&G's Duncan Hines holds an estimated 40% share of the more than $756 million mix category (exclusive of cookie mixes).

"[P&G's] philosophy is that cake mix, as a category, is dying, and that the real growth will come from high-quality dessert items, like muffins and brownies," a midwestern grocery buyer told Advertising Age.

Slices of the cake market

Despite new product introductions, Procter & Gamble remains the leader in the $500 million single and double layer cake market. Source: Kidder, Peabody, New York, and Advertising Age.

A P&G spokesman denied any implication that the company was forsaking the standard cake category, although he did note that P&G already is "very diversified in the cake area with over a dozen flavors" and that there is more opportunity for "diversification and flavor extensions in brownies and muffins."

The numbers, though, suggest the regular segment is

Ford planning major revamp of marketing

By JESSE SNYDER

Detroit—Ford Motor Co. executives are preparing massive marketing changes they believe will breed success for the company into the next century.

Radical changes at the second-largest auto maker will affect advertising agencies, marketing divisions, media and dealers. Ford's top executives are rethinking the marketing program right down to gauging the thought processes of different customer-types before they buy a car.

As a result, Lincoln-Mercury division last week hired one new specialized agency and may be considering another.

Ford's efforts will not involve the sweeping structural changes of General Motors Corp.'s reorganization (AA, Dec. 19, '83, et seq.). But Ford's are no less market-oriented and, in a different way, as profound as those of the No. 1 auto maker.

Ford's changes are just taking shape, but the over-all change from a largely autocratic, manufacturing-oriented company to a slimmed-down, marketing-oriented one is cropping up on several levels:

- Ford is researching the "thought process" that precedes new-car purchases and the differences

Hey, got a minute?

Super Bowl 'break' draws crowd

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

When NBC Sports executive producer Michael Weisman decided to let tv screens go dark for a minute during its Super Bowl XX pregame telecast, he never expected to be accused of using Big Brother tactics to control when America goes to the bathroom.

Nor did NBC Sports sales expect to have advertisers call up asking to buy into a minute of network time when nothing but a ticking clock would be on the screen. But after the plan to run a 60-second "intermission" during the Jan. 26 pregame show was revealed in Advertising Age (AA, Dec. 2), the phones at NBC started ringing from advertisers and the media alike. The story spread across the country and into Europe, gaining momentum and leading NBC Sports sales to believe they were on to something big.

"They [the salesmen] believe more people than ever will tune into the pregame show just to see the blank screen," Mr. Weisman said. "It's tv sports' version of the eclipse."

Sources said Timex Inc. wanted to have its logo on the clock that will be used to time the minute break. Anheuser-Busch reportedly asked either to sponsor the intermission or have the Budweiser jingle playing during the break.

A Timex spokesman said he had "no knowledge of any plans to do anything involving Timex and the Super Bowl." Anheuser-Busch execs declined comment on the report. Kevin Monaghan, an NBC Sports spokesman, said the minute is still coming out of programing time and will not be sold.

Mr. Monaghan said a variety of media contacted Mr. Weisman to talk to him about the idea, while members of the NBC Sports information staff were called on last week to do radio interviews.

Early last week, the idea seemed to be more of a

Health claims get healthier 3

A controversial advertising strategy became more alluring last week when a federal health official seemed to invite marketers to take advantage of the government's changing attitude toward health claims for foods and consumer advertising of prescription drugs. The ad industry reacted with cautious optimism.

And Saatchi makes three 6

Saatchi & Saatchi Co. last week revealed plans to create a major new London ad agency that will operate independently from the parent company. The move would give the Saatchi group three agencies in the U.K.'s top 10, and enhance the British group's ability to handle accounts that conflict with accounts at Saatchi & Saatchi and Dorland Advertising.

Mail rates take hike 12

The U.S. Postal Service last week made good on its threat to raise rates for not-for-profit and other mailers that enjoy taxpayer-subsidized postal rates. The size of the increases, effective Jan. 1, will vary from publication to publication.

Radio volume lowered 27

The radio industry will hardly feel it when Ford Motor Co. launches its new Taurus and Sable models Dec. 26 with the biggest single ad blitz in company history. Dearborn, Mich.-based Ford has allocated only $4 million to radio out of an estimated $100 million introductory budget, according to a Radio Advertising Bureau survey of Detroit-area advertisers.

Ashton-Tate gets on dBase 35

Ashton-Tate, feeling the competitive waters around it heat up, launched a preemptive strike to shore up its leading position in the personal-computer database software market. The pc software publisher, which last month moved from Culver City to expanded quarters in Torrance, Cal., introduced dBase III Plus at the Computer Dealers Expo in Las Vegas. An enhanced version of dBase III, the new program allows linked pcs to share information, a key feature for marketing to larger corporations.

Teacher's learning a lesson 66

W.V. Elliott Co. faces a formidable task in trying to resurrect Teacher's scotch from a long-term sales decline. It also must buck over-all lagging popularity in the U.S. for scotch whisky. Having seen its reputation sag as the drink of upscale imbibers, scotch—like most brown goods—has been losing sales for several years to vodka and rum, which are now the dominant spirits in the alcoholic beverage industry.

Sweets from the sweeps 67

If it's December, it must be time for the Big 3 tv networks to pick through the November sweeps ratings results and trumpet the positives. Unlike last year, there were highlights to be found for over-all network viewing.

Rv sellers sound call of the road 69

Marketers of recreational vehicles, strapped by the image of motor homes carrying golden oldies down the highway toward the sunset, are searching for a way to get baby-boomers to warm up to the rv life style. It was evident last week at the Recreation Vehicle Industry Assn.'s annual trade show that rv marketers want to attract more first-time buyers. Manufacturers and dealers are expected to dump a total of $300 million into advertising this year.

Clorox asks for 20-sec. tv spots

By VERNE GAY

Clorox Co. has asked the tv networks to begin accepting stand-alone 20-second commercials, a move that would further erode the 30-second spot as the tv standard and add to the fractionalizing of acceptable commercial lengths.

Clorox, Oakland, Cal., is pressing for the 20s because, it says, its creative executions for 30-second spots cannot be converted to 15-seconds. While all three tv nets accept "split 30s"—a 30-second commercial pod containing two different ads for products from the same advertiser —CBS-TV has also started taking stand-alone 15s.

ABC-TV and NBC-TV are expected to follow suit and begin accepting stand-alone 15s early next

DDB sees drop in '85 earnings

The Doyle Dane Bernbach Group, which a year ago said the worst was behind it financially, informed securities analysts last week in a private meeting that earnings could plunge 37% to $5.4 million for 1985, compared with $8.7 million in 1984.

According to sources, Robert Pfundstein, DDB exec vp-chief financial and administrative officer, said the earnings shortfall was due to declining client spending (including some unexpected fourth-quarter cutbacks) as well as money-losing operations in Australia (pretax loss of $700,000), Hong Kong (pretax loss of $800,000) and Fletcher/-

Saatchi plans third major London shop

By LAUREL WENTZ and STEWART ALTER

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi Co. last week revealed plans to create a major new London ad agency that will operate independently from the parent company.

The move would give the Saatchi group three agencies in the U.K.'s top 10, and enhance the British group's ability to handle accounts that conflict with accounts at Saatchi & Saatchi and Dorland Advertising.

Saatchi is taking over Humphreys Bull and Barker, a $40 million agency with a good creative reputation and attractive multinational clients, including General Mills, and merging it with Saatchi's own creatively troubled KMP, which recently lost its largest client, British Telecom. Two other Saatchi-owned agencies, Downton Advertising Ltd. and Crawford Halls London, also will be added to the new agency, which will be called KMP Humphreys Bull and Barker.

Although the new agency will function separately, it will be part of the Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide network, unlike Dorland Advertising, which is owned by the Saatchi holding company, but is outside SSC&W and is building its own international network.

"We at KMP Humphreys Bull and Barker will be competing head-to-head with both Dorland and Saatchi and other agencies of significance in the U.K.," said Stuart Bull, planning and new-business director of Humphreys Bull. Mr. Bull will retain the same title at the new agency. Mr. Bull said the new agency would be the ninth-largest here, with billings of about $120 million. Saatchi and Dorland rank first and third.

The new agency will resign at least one account—Lever Industrial—which Humphreys Bull handles for "a small consultancy fee." That account conflicts with Saatchi client Procter & Gamble.

Another conflict, between KMP client Carlsberg beer, worth about $12 million, and Humphreys Bull's Allied Breweries business, billing about $750,000, still is being discussed, Mr. Bull said.

KMP's chairman, managing director and financial director all resigned last week to make way for new management from Humphreys Bull. The Humphreys Bull principals will receive equity in Saatchi & Saatchi rather than a cash payment for their agency, and they will run the new agency.

"Saatchi had a number of agencies that had mixed fortunes," said Jack Rubins, chairman of Dorland Advertising.

"It gives Saatchi a third force in the U.K.," said Bill Seward, an analyst at London stockbroker Philips & Drew. "By adding Humphreys Bull to KMP and Crawford, Saatchi will have a much stronger and more effective unit."

In New York last week, Saatchi & Saatchi also reported more than $60 million in business referred from one segment of its business to another for the six months ended Sept. 30.

Saatchi has "only just begun to develop the potential of this system," said chairman Maurice Saatchi in announcing results for the fiscal year.

"We are working with 53 of the world's top 100 companies, with more than 20 of them across three or more business services and with more than 20 across five or more countries," said Mr. Saatchi.

Mr. Saatchi also announced that the acquisition-minded company had about $190 million in cash.

For the fiscal year, revenue rose 105%, to $375 million, from the previous year. The increase mostly reflects major acquisitions such as the Hay Group consulting company and Yankelovich, Skelly and White research company.

Likewise, Saatchi's pretax profits rose to $50.3 million from $22.8 million. Pretax profit margins as a per cent of revenue rose to 13.4% from 12.4%, especially reflecting improved margins at Hay from 11.5% to 14%.

The U.S. now accounts for 62% of Saatchi's revenues and 58% of its profits, compared with 24% and 29% for the U.K. and 14% and 13% for the rest of the world (AA, Nov. 18).

Mr. Saatchi also indicated that plans were afoot for expanding the consulting business. Milton Rock, who has been Hay's chairman, "has taken up the chairmanship of our consulting division and is developing plans to take the company into all the key areas of consulting in the years ahead," said Mr. Saatchi.#

Ally picks Dexheimer

NEW YORK—Larry Dexheimer has been named chief operating officer of Ally & Gargano, a post that has been vacant since Edward Gallagher left the agency 16 months ago.

The creative department will not report to him, but account management, broadcast operations, media, research and traffic will, according to a staff memo from Amil Gargano, chairman-ceo.

"As soon as he can get his things packed, he will move into the office next to me," said Mr. Gargano in his memo.

Mr. Dexheimer, who joined Ally in 1970, has been senior vp-director of marketing services at the agency, in charge of the media and research activities for all accounts. He became chairman of the agency's operations committee in 1984.#

Court backs Barclay ads

Washington—Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., Louisville, can advertise Barclay cigaret tar ratings even though they are not sanctioned by the Federal Trade Commission, a U.S. circuit court of appeals ruled here this week. B&W can advertise the ratings providing it doesn't imply they are comparable to brands tested by the FTC method. The decision partially overturns a lower-court ruling in favor of the FTC (AA, Oct. 17, '83). Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago, handles.

Chiat shares more shares

New York—Chiat/Day, Los Angeles, has taken another step toward wider employe ownership; chairman-ceo Jay Chiat has sold 30% of his remaining shares to the agency's employe shareholder ownership plan. He plans eventually to sell a majority 51% to that program. The agency was 100% owned by Mr. Chiat until he distributed 15% of his shares to key managers a year ago. "This allows Jay to get his money out of the agency without selling to an outsider," said Bob Wolfe, exec vp-general manager of the agency's office here. He added the sale does not signal any plan by Mr. Chiat to leave the agency.

The question: There's a growing trend for advertisers to return to television production, especially with miniseries and made-for-tv movies. With the risks involved, is this the way to go?

Bill Evans, senior vp-executive media director, Foote, Cone & Belding, Los Angeles: Yes, they should if they have the budget. But they have to remember it's an expensive proposition to mount a tv show. I've seen some clients get enamored of the idea and get close to making a deal. Then they come to realize that they hadn't figured on talent fees and other major costs. It's expensive, and it doesn't necessarily mean you can make a quality show. So for clients like Mazda, it's a great idea. But for average clients, it's probably too dear.

B. EVANS

C. BACHRACH

Charles Bachrach, senior vp-network and programing, Western International Media, Los Angeles: Yes, for a couple of reasons: The cost of buying time is getting exorbitant. It gives them more control over the message, and hopefully they can develop programing compatible [demographically] to the commercial message. For networks, programing costs are so expensive they're looking for partnerships with clients. On the down side, it involves a long-term commitment for a return a client might not see for a year.

James Spero, senior vp-media director, Doyle Dane Bernbach/West, Los Angeles: If they want to put up the money, it could be terrific. Certainly, programing right now could use a shot in the arm. We need innovative programing, especially in cable. But it's a gamble. You might not get the ratings you want. It can be very cost-effective or you can lose your shirt, or somewhere in between.

J. SPERO

Gerrold Rubin, president, Needham Harper Worldwide, Los Angeles: It's just unaffordable to sponsor an entire show. From a production standpoint, no, I don't feel advertisers should interfere with the creative process; on the other hand, advertisers can add a perspective, because they know who their target audience is. When we look at a show, editorial content is more important to us than ratings.

Larry Olshan, president, Wells, Rich, Greene/West, Los Angeles: If it's a right fit for the advertiser—if the advertiser is large enough—very definitely. You can create your own environment in which you have complete control. It can be more efficient. But in the case of producing continuing series, the risks are horrendous with the high failure rate of new programing. We're seeing more of it now, but mostly it's a case of the big getting bigger.

Technology gives new look to great outdoors

By Richard Edel

New technology gave outdoor advertising a giant boost two weeks ago when Eastman Kodak unveiled the world's largest color photograph on the facade of New York's new Marriott Marquis Hotel overlooking Times Square.

The photograph, a scene from Tri-Star Pictures' "Santa Claus —The Movie," is not your average drugstore print. At 30 ft. by 50 ft., it marks the first "spectacular" size print, the first use of photography on an outdoor backlight display and a demonstration of how technology is changing the face of the industry.

But Rochester, N.Y.-based Kodak is not alone in the race to revolutionize out-of-home advertising with new products, techniques and materials.

Mediacom, a Toronto-based subsidiary of Gannett Co., Arlington, Va., early in 1985 introduced a new technique for reproducing signs on outdoor bulletins using a product called Superflex, a tough, flexible polyvinyl chloride plastic that previously was used only for backlight boards.

Other innovative companies are using pvc products to put outdoor boards in motion and to add a third dimension—depth—to poster displays. There also is a boom in the use of electronic message centers, allowing advertisers to continually update information on outdoor boards. One company, Clark White & Associates, Spokane, Wash., even has created a talking outdoor board.

Kodak scored a coup with the Marriott display, which it has secured through a long-term lease. The company not only unveiled its first print the day before millions lined up to watch Macy's Thanksgiving parade, but it also flashed holiday greetings to the crowd from a 6-by-50-ft. electronic message center mounted beneath the photograph.

"We wanted something so dazzling that it would make people stop and look," says Scott Grover, coordinator-market development for Kodak professional products.

The company wanted a full-size color transparency similar to Kodak's Colorama display in New York's Grand Central Terminal. Colorama is an indoor display measuring 1,080 sq. ft. The Marriott display, dubbed Kodarama, is one-third larger, mounted 30 ft. above the sidewalk and outdoors. Large scale outdoor photographs were untested.

"If this works the way we expect, we will have our name and image in the heart of the most visible location on the planet," Mr. Grover says. The backlight display will be viewed by about 1.5 million persons each day. If all goes well, the Kodarama print will be changed six times a year.

Depending on how the transparency and its mounting system holds up to the elements, Kodak is on the verge of introducing photography as an outdoor medium. Kodak accomplished essentially the same thing in 1981 for indoor backlight displays with the development of Duratrans, a heavy-duty pvc material.

"We all think photography is going to have an amazing impact on outdoor," says George Stonbely, principal with Spectacolor in New York. "What we've had to this point is airbrushing, screen printing and hand painting, but there's nothing that compares with an actual photograph."

A newly formed subsidiary of Mr. Stonbely's company, Spectarama, is responsible for installing and maintaining the Marriott display and for suggesting Kodak as the exclusive advertiser.

The Kodarama photo at the Marriott is reproduced on Duratrans, double laminated with a polyester material for protection from the weather and coated with matte vinyl to protect against ultraviolet sunlight.

The photo consists of 17 pieces of Duratrans spliced together at Kodak's Rochester laboratory and mounted on site with hooks and grommets in a large frame box. Backlighting is provided by approximately 900 fluorescent lamps producing 180 kilowatts. The lamps adjust for three levels of brightness.

To keep the transparency taut, Kodak engineers devised a system of 10 blowers mounted inside the frame box. The blowers create a partial vacuum by displacing air behind the photograph. Controlled automatically by dampers, the resulting inward bow of up to 12 ins. makes the photo "tight as a drum," says Jerrold J. Gearhart, Kodak supervisor of technical services. The blowers perform a dual purpose by also venting heat from the lights, which otherwise could cause distortion of the photo.

Although Kodarama is not yet available commercially, Kodak's Mr. Grover already is fielding inquiries, and he sees great potential. "This is a totally new concept, and we're going to make information [about the Marriott project] available to everyone," he says. "Our hope ultimately is to call attention to the fact that photography is an outstanding medium for outdoor."

Another innovation expected to have a big effect on out-of-home display is development by Mediacom of a process that allows ad reproduction on its Lumiflex pvc material on outdoor bulletins, or "superboards" as they are called in Canada. Previously, Lumiflex was used only for poster and backlight displays.

Mediacom, Canada's leading outdoor company, has spent more than $8 million in capital investments in the past year, opening the largest, most advanced airbrushing studio in North America. The company also maintains North America's largest screen printing press to produce 10-by-30-ft. backlight faces in one piece.

In 1985, Mediacom introduced Superflex, a process of reproducing ads in sections on large sheets of Lumiflex (up to 14 ft. by 48 ft.), which are seamlessly bonded and stretched over an existing superboard structure. The result is a standardized, high-quality reproduction rivaling photography, says Bill Smalley, marketing manager at Mediacom.

"It's not like you're going to have an artist in one city who is having a bad day. The quality of the reproduction in each market doesn't depend on the artist's mood," Mr. Smalley says.

Superflex has several advantages over poster paper in that it is more durable and reusable, lasting up to five years. It is easily posted and taken down, can be printed on both sides, and it is more economical than hand painting on orders of eight-plus poster faces, Mr. Smalley says.

"This is the next generation in outdoor advertising. Nothing else can touch it," he says. "It's going to revolutionize the superboard concept."

Air Canada, the first of several national advertisers in Canada to use Superflex, was impressed with the material. The airline ran a program in 11 markets through mid-fall and plans a bigger one in 1986.

The ability to transfer ads to different locations was an advantage in reaching a target au-

Motion becomes an element of outdoor boards such as this one for Miller beer using discs that move and reflect light.

Rolling boards shift into gear

Two years ago a passing truck triggered an idea that set Joe Commerford and Stuart Shore on a quest.

"You know," Mr. Commerford recalls saying as a tractor-trailer rolled by while they were stalled in traffic, "I've wanted for 30 years to put signage on the side of that truck." Mr. Shore liked the idea, and the two quit their jobs at a Chicago outdoor sign company to form Mobilmedia Corp., Park Forest, Ill., in 1984.

Early next year, Mobilmedia will begin marketing rolling outdoor boards. The concept involves printing outdoor boards on polyvinyl chloride material, stretching it over a frame and attaching it to trucks with aluminum brackets.

New Visions, Miami, recently began marketing a similar product, and Vehicle Displays, New York, markets a product called Prestige Panels.

"The idea has tremendous potential," says John P. McGill, executive director of the American Trucking Foundation in Washington. "It's a heck of a big idea with lots of potential impressions, but it takes a lot to get something like this going."

A 1977 trucking foundation study sponsored by 3M found daylight exposure to graphics on over-the-road trucks generated 101 visual impressions a mile, or 10.1 million impressions per 100,000 yearly miles. Local delivery trucks rated even better dience of business fliers, says Joyce Roblee, vp-media director at Ronalds-Reynolds, Montreal, which handles the Air Canada account. "[Superflex boards] were probably the one medium in the plan that built frequency," she says. The agency also liked the quality control in getting boards from one source, she says.

The material is being introduced in the U.S. by Gannett Outdoor of Chicago, which will be using it early in 1986 for outdoor bulletins for Soft Sheen, Marriott and Carson Pirie Scott & Co., a local retailer, says Dawyne Williams, account exec in the Chicago office. "We feel confident it will be a huge success here," he says.

Another innovation that is gaining favor is a new technique from Modern Graphics, New York, for producing three-dimensional posters and signs. The company counts a dozen of the top 200 U.S. advertisers in tobacco, liquor, soft drinks, oil, computers and electronics as clients, says Bob Gold, a principal with the company.

Modern Graphic's innovation is a process of heat-sealed embossing that is superior to the more universal technique of injection molding. With the embossing technique, pvc panels are printed like a flat piece with colors in register. Injection molding requires that printing be a quarter-inch to a half-inch out of register, which leads to unpredictable results, Mr. Gold says.

"There is no way to know what the final color is going to look like with injection molding until it's printed, and this is after you've spent thousands of dollars. More important is the time you lose," he says. "With our printing technique, what the art director approves on the color proof is what he gets. And we can hold incredible detail."

Molds for the 3-D signs are made from papier-mache sculptures created by art students in Italy. Posters can range from 9 ft. by 12 ft. to a maximum of 26 ft. by 38 ft. with a raised surface of up to 3 ins. Typical cost is between $2 and $6 per unit, Mr. Gold says.

"There is no difference in terms of cost than for flat paper. Agencies have no added expense," he says. The largest run so far was 30,000 signs.

with 16 million visual impressions per 100,000 yearly miles. Nighttime use of trucks increased impressions by 37.5%.

"Our studies prove that a heck of a lot of people see trucks. This shapes their attitudes about a company and its products," Mr. McGill says.

But rolling boards, though promising, remain unproven with advertisers.

Outdoor Services, a San Francisco-based agency, tried them in Portland, Ore., for introduction of Hiram Walker's Royal Canadian brand several years ago. Dennis Zinchook, vp-account supervisor at Simons Michelson Zieve, Troy, Mich., the brand's agency, says followup interviews by Mobile Billboards, a Salt Lake City company that since has gone out of business, showed 314% better brand recognition.

"Those results are almost too remarkable, and I'm not sure how believable," Mr. Zinchook says. "I believe the advertising was effective, but the brand didn't show such remarkable sales figures."

Mr. Zinchook says he would consider trying rolling boards again, depending on market, situation and cost.

Still another innovation is the use of materials that put outdoor displays in motion. Flektagrafix, formerly Air Display, a St. Louis-based display company, uses a multitude of quarter-size discs attached to beveled pegs on high-impact polystyrene boards. Air movement activates the discs to reflect sun and artificial light.

The discs pegs are made of polycarbonate and coated with acrylic for bright colors that will not fade, says Dan Shroyer, principal with the company. Mr. Shroyer started his company after seeing the signs in West Germany. After buying one for a business, "I couldn't believe the response!" he says.

Air Display holds the U.S. rights to a technique developed by German inventor Johannes Matthiesen, which seems to overcome some of the problems that have plagued moving parts on outdoor boards.

So far, Air Display has tested three signs in the St. Louis market and has licensed an Illinois outdoor company to produce two signs. "You can't talk to anyone in St. Louis who hasn't seen our signs," Mr. Shroyer says. "It makes it a very fun job."

The Foster & Kleiser division of Metromedia recently placed an outdoor bulletin in Chicago for the Illinois Film Office thanking film makers for supporting the growing Illinois motion picture industry. The bulletin incorporates thousands of pvc discs as the sparkling attire of Abraham Lincoln, who is tipping his hat in thanks. The irreverent style, not possible without new materials, foreshadows exciting things in store.

"It's a new era," one sign company executive says. "It's unbelievable."

Ford Motor Co., which tested rolling boards in 10 markets during the 1983 introduction of Ford Tempo, met with disappointing results, says Roger C. Olsen, formerly ad manager with Ford division and now sales/promotion manager for light trucks.

"We listened to all the claims and gave it a shot. It was not satisfactory," he says. "We felt it provided less recall than stationary boards."

Barbara Barczyk, outdoor buyer for J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, which represents Ford, says 1,552 rolling signs were placed, and followup shopping mall interviews showed aided and unaided advertising awareness of 4% in Omaha and 10% in Denver. Ford was hoping for awareness levels in the 20% to 30% range, she says.

Mobilmedia's Mr. Shore acknowledges some companies may have had problems in the past, but believes his company has improved both the technique and the materials for rolling outdoor boards. For example, Mobilmedia uses Toronto-based Mediacom's new Superflex material. Mobilmedia's bracketing system permits changing outdoor boards in as little as 30 minutes, he says.

"We perceive this as a whole new medium. It's going to open up a lot of opportunities for everybody involved." —R.E.

NBC RUNS ON THE OUTDOOR CHANNEL.

We're proud as a peacock. And for good reason.

That's because last year, as part of a joint project promoting the epic religious mini-series "A.D.", NBC chose to supplement their traditional advertising with a first-ever run on the Outdoor Channel.

And the results were impressive.

In test markets across the country, Outdoor Advertising for "A.D." began a month before the premiere episode. And at the end of 30 days, 80% of our targeted audience had seen "A.D." Outdoor ads about 14 times.

Even more importantly, average first night audience share jumped 79% over past levels for similar religious mini-series.

The Outdoor Channel delivered for NBC. With proven effectiveness and measurable results, Outdoor reached women in business, young affluent professionals and households earning in excess of $25-thousand.

What's more, Outdoor Advertising gave NBC one key group that was virtually unreachable even on their own medium—light TV viewers.

If you want to reach and move your key prospects with that kind of impact and efficiency, you need the Outdoor Channel. Simple. Direct. Uncluttered. And positioned enviably in the middle of the world's most affluent and mobile society.

Industry battles beauty and beast images

By Lisa Phillips

True or false:

- The public dislikes outdoor boards and would like to do away with them.
- The Highway Beautification Act of 1965 has done little or nothing to improve the aesthetic quality of U.S. highways.
- The outdoor board lobby has sponsored amendments that have weakened the 1965 HBA.

If you answered "true" to any of the above statements, the Outdoor Advertising Assn. of America, a Washington-based trade group, has a pamphlet it would like you to read. "A New Look. Outdoor Advertising Myths & Facts" was published three months ago to combat anti-outdoor board stories appearing in national media, proposed legislation and any media coverage of the 20th anniversary of the passage of the Highway Beautification Act.

To those opponents who argue that the Federal Highway Administration has failed to regulate the outdoor industry, the OAAA cites figures from that federal agency showing the total number of signs has dropped from 1.1 million in 1966 to only 500,000 as of August. The number of signs per mile has dropped from 4.4 in 1966 to 1.7 this year, and outdoor advertising signs in commercial and industrial areas fell from 260,659 in 1966 to 241,608 this year.

As proof that the public really does like outdoor boards, the OAAA cites a nationwide survey conducted by the University of Michigan Survey Research Center that shows 64.5% of the people polled favored "reasonable regulation" of outdoor advertising. Only 19% favored doing away with outdoor ads.

Despite an expected 6% increase in outdoor ad spending this year, with an estimated 10% increase for 1986, and the dynamic emergence of new networks among outdoor companies, the industry is fighting image problems in the advertising industry as well as aesthetic issues.

About 80% of outdoor advertisers are local merchants and companies advertising in local markets, according to Bill Wilkins, president of the Institute of Outdoor Advertising, New York, the marketing arm of the outdoor industry. While total ad spending this year is projected at $98 billion, spending in the outdoor medium hit the $1 billion mark for the first time only two years ago and is projected at $1.23 billion in 1985.

Outdoor advertising frequently is overlooked by advertisers and agencies, many industry executives say, partially because of the belief that "outdoor is hard to buy."

One opponent of that sentiment is Martin Mullaney, president-chief executive officer of Out-of-Home Media Services, New York. Mr. Mullaney says buying outdoor advertising is easier than buying spot broadcast advertising.

Gordon and Richard Asch, owners of Asch Advertising, New York, an agency that deals exclusively in outdoor advertising, say outdoor buys can be as targeted as more expensive media such as broadcast and print.

Jim Creel, president of Creel Outdoor, Myrtle Beach, S.C., and this year's chairman of the IOA, argues against the popularity of broadcasting among advertisers.

"What we used to call broadcast media are now narrowcast media," he says. "You've got formatted tv stations now, like formatted radio stations. So you're losing, throughout the nation, a broad appeal for mass products. Outdoor can both broadcast and narrowcast."

But getting that message across to ad agency people is a continuous process, he says. It isn't unusual for the IOA to make creative and media presentations to account personnel at agencies, only to have them leave for other jobs within the year. Then the education process has to begin again.

Morris Communications Corporation Buys Naegele Outdoor Advertising

The Naegele Outdoor Advertising Companies were purchased in July by Morris Communications Corporation, Augusta, Georgia. Morris Communications Corporation (MCC), headed by William S. Morris III, chairman and chief executive officer, is comprised of daily and weekly newspaper businesses, commercial printing and computer operations. Upon the purchase of Naegele Outdoor Advertising, MCC became one of the top media companies in the United States.

Paul S. Simon is president of MCC. Richard E. Condon will continue as president of the Naegele Companies. A. Wayne Lamm serves as Naegele's national sales manager.

Morris Communications intends to preserve the tradition of excellence Naegele has established in the Outdoor industry by vigilantly maintaining and upgrading its Outdoor structures. The Naegele Companies were recently among the first major Outdoor concerns to offer early morning illumination (from 6-8 am). The 6-8 am drive time period accounts for over 11 percent of daily effective circulation, according to the Traffic Audit Bureau. Naegele's added illumination, at no extra charge, will mean even more exposure for Naegele advertisers.

Morris Communications Corporation media properties include: Alaska–Juneau Empire; Florida–Florida Times-Union, Jacksonville Journal, St. Augustine Record; Georgia–Athens Banner Herald, Athens Daily News, Augusta Chronicle, Augusta Herald, Savannah Morning News, Savannah Evening Press; Texas–Amarillo Daily News, Amarillo Globe-Times, Lubbock Avalanche-Journal, Lubbock Evening Journal. versary of the Highway Beautification Act, this year also marks significant changes within the outdoor ad industry. In July, Gannett Outdoor Group, New York, formed the Outdoor Network USA with 21 other outdoor companies (AA, July 29), offering advertisers and agencies a nationwide system of outdoor companies in 75% of the top 100 areas of dominant influence.

Gannett's claim that nearly 40% of the nation's outdoor boards can be bought with a single phone call and only one invoice spurred more innovation.

Asch Advertising, according to Richard Asch, always has been able to service clients with the one phone call-one invoice outdoor buy, but since the Outdoor Network USA debut, even more services began offering their own versions.

Creative Marketing Services, Augusta, Ga., developed a computerized outdoor rates database to help advertisers, agencies and outdoor plant operators look into major markets and more smaller ones all over the U.S. The brainchild of CMS president Alice Vantrease, the database gives rate information by state, county, city, area of dominant influence and standard metropolitan statistical area.

The program features the one phone call-one invoice service to every outdoor company in the U.S., and like Outdoor Network USA, production costs can be included in estimating the buy.

More and more media companies are finding outdoor plants and networks to be attractive investments. This summer, Savannah, Ga.-based Morris Communications purchased Naegele Outdoor Co., Minneapolis, for an estimated $400 million.

Metromedia Inc., this summer rumored to be selling Los Angeles-based subsidiary Foster & Kleiser, is reopening the company's Detroit sales office.

Changes at the upper level of the outdoor industry have filtered down to local plant operators, Mr. Creel says.

Plant operators are updating their signs, physical structures and facilities. Plant operators are more environmentally sensitive, he says, and will landscape a board's site. That's because, in his view, good-looking outdoor structures "enhance that city's business reputation. It reflects well on the community, and more businesses will want to use outdoor ads."

On the legislative front, the outdoor industry faces escalating attacks. Congress this summer held hearings to talk of banning the industry's two biggest spenders, liquor and tobacco marketers, a loss of more than $260 million annually to the industry.

In Washington, a 2-year-old lobby called the Coalition for Scenic Beauty is pressuring Congress for tighter controls and regulations on the outdoor medium.

The coalition, together with other environmental and consumer groups, contends the outdoor ad industry, represented by the OAAA, has emasculated the Highway Beautification Act through amendments benefiting the medium and not the public.

Sen. Slade Gorton, (R., Wash.), recently introduced a bill that would prohibit placement of new outdoor boards along federally funded highways and roadways and calls for amoritization of the existing boards, phasing them out within a five-year period.

The bill also would eliminate an outdoor company's right to cut vegetation obstructing signs and would turn all cash compensation matters, a standard practice now handled by the federal government, over to state agencies for removing boards from federal highways.

Competitions provide positive exposure

France

By Claire Wilson

A visitor to Paris in June, designated National Advertising Month, will see outdoor boards in as much color and prominence as the traditional sights of the city.

The city will host the second annual International Outdoor Advertising Competition, open to advertising creatives around the world.

As many as 10 advertising exhibitions are planned for both the public and the professionals, but emphasis is on public participation. "The public is, after all, the target for advertising, isn't it?" says Philippe Benoit, director of Agora, Paris, the company charged with promoting French outdoor advertising.

As beautiful a backdrop as Paris will be, however, it will be difficult to top Nimes, the site of the first international contest. For three days last June, the picturesque hamlet, with some of France's best known Roman ruins, was transformed into a mecca of outdoor advertising. Outdoor boards and transit ads were mounted all over the city.

J. Walter Thompson London's campaign for Persil detergents, by illustrator David Fairman, took the grand prize for the competition.

Twelve international judges reviewed 713 entries from 16 countries to name winners in 19 categories, plus the grand prize.

The classifications for the winners are the same as for the American OBIE competition, without classification by size or application. "The only criteria is that they appear on the street," Mr. Benoit says.

Before the event, contest organizers posted promotional no-poster posters. The outdoor boards by References Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, Neurilly, France, featured a life-size board installer seated on a stool in the corner. Scrawled across the top, as if in apology for his idleness, was the legend: "The poster's in Nimes."

Outdoor companies donated space with an estimated value of $60,000 for 100 placements in Paris in March and the end of May.

Entries for the first contest were sent by outdoor advertising associations in each participating country. In 1986, agencies will be invited to send entries for a fee of about $50 each.

New rules will allow more than one prize per category. "We found ourselves with several good posters in a particular category and limited to just one prize, or in some cases, with no deserving winners in a category, [we were] faced with making a selection and an award anyway," Mr. Benoit says.

Organizers came by the idea to begin an international competition, as is often the case in France, over dinner.

Agora and others in the outdoor industry had been organizing the French Advertising Festival in Corsica each September for 12 years. As French advertising and media become more international, with the invasion of satellite tv, foreign investors in land-based tv, the purchase of French agencies by Americans and the export of French agencies and media like Filipacchi's Elle, the idea for an interna-

Open Publi created this board for Armani, a winner in the apparel category in Italy's first outdoor board festival.

Italgas' board from Gruppo G. Comunicazione won in the miscellaneous category in Italy's contest.

Promo's designed this winning food category board for Gran Premio in Italy.

Persil campaign from J. Walter Thompson in London won the grand prize in the International Outdoor Advertising Competition, promoted by boards from References Saatchi & Saatchi Compton.

All of this is seen as unfair and unnecessary regulation by the OAAA and members of the outdoor industry. Local disputes with outdoor advertising should be settled by local municipalities, an OAAA spokesman says.

Also, the right to operate an outdoor plant in any community is protected under the First Amendment as freedom of speech, Mr. Creel says, echoing the OAAA's stand.

Any amortization of outdoor boards amounts to seizure of private property by the government, and the OAAA and outdoor plant operators "are working very closely to defend their right . . . as property owners and corporate citizens, to operate the medium in commercial and industrial areas," Mr. Creel says.

Numerous articles have appeared this year in national consumer and newsmagazines, stirring public outcry against "billboard blight." The most reactionary article, according to Mr. Creel, ran in the June issue of Reader's Digest. That article, written by a contributing editor of the magazine, called the outdoor ad industry "parasitic" and urged readers to contact the Coalition for Scenic Beauty in support of Sen. Gorton's bill.

But the irony of the situation, says Foster & Kleiser's senior vp-eastern sales director John Mathis, is that at the time of the article, Reader's Digest had purchased the outdoor board directly across from the main entrance to Procter & Gamble in Cincinnati.

Reader's Digest's outdoor campaign ran from March through June, Mr. Mathis says.

Editor's note: With agency creative departments and media departments clearly working more closely than ever, ADVERTISING AGE Thursday is helping their collaboration blossom.

Creatives and media directors, planners and buyers find they must meet more frequently to work out new creative solutions to the challenges posed by new media options such as 20-second and 15-second tv commercials, syndicated tv and radio packages, cable and cassette opportunities.

To assist them in their work, AA's "Magazine of the Creative Process" today expands its coverage and analysis of developments that relate to creative/media departments' disciplines.

Each Thursday, this "MediaWorks" page—supervised by New York-based news editor Craig Reiss—will include late information on television and radio availabilities, interpret tv ratings and discuss the meaning of the changes that are rapidly taking place.

In addition, "Street Talk" (see Page 3) provides agency media and creative executives opportunities to go on record with their views about events that relate to their clients' interests. ■

TV AVAILS

A weekly listing of tv programming that still has commercial availabilities open in the next few weeks.

"Hollywood Reporter," a Monday-through-Friday strip clone of Paramount's "Entertainment Tonight," has cleared 80% of the U.S. and is sold out for its Dec. 23 debut week. Columbia Pictures is producing the show with the Hollywood Reporter. LBS Communications, New York, is handling distribution and sales, and says it could juggle some advertiser scheduling to get a late-comer or two into the premiere week. No pricing revealed.

"Elvis: The Echo Will Never Die," a one-hour special on the rock 'n' roll legend who never got this much coverage when he was living, is scheduled for broadcast between Jan. 4 and Feb. 9. All American Television, New York, has already cleared the special in 85% of the U.S. and is just now hitting the streets to sell time.

BILL BOGGS

They're asking $18,000 per 30 seconds. No advertisers are signed yet.

"The Boy King," a one-hour dramatic special on the early life of Martin Luther King, is set for syndicated broadcast between Jan. 11 and Feb. 16. Actor Howard Rollins, who played the lead role in "Ragtime" and was up for an Oscar for his role in "A Soldier's Story," plays the young Dr. King. All American Television, New York, is handling distribution and sales. They're looking for full or half sponsorships; $300,000 or $150,000, respectively. All American has just started selling the show.

"Comedy Tonight," hosted and co-produced by New York tv celebrity Bill Boggs, the late-night Monday-through-Friday strip show has nine 30-second spots still open through December. Orbis Communications, New York, handles distribution and sales for the comedy talent showcase show, which has cleared in 105 markets covering 78% of U.S. tv households. Rate card is $5,500 per 30 seconds with a 2.0 rating guarantee. Procter & Gamble and Bristol-Myers are among the advertisers that have already purchased 327 spots in the series.

"Kids Inc.," a half-hour syndicated by Orbis Communications, has one $14,000 spot for the week of Dec. 16. It carries a 3.5 rating guarantee. Mattel Inc. and Mars Inc. are among the sponsors.

"Break the Bank," the Gene Rayburn-hosted game show, is cleared in 65% of the country and has four spots open in December. Orbis Communications is the barter syndicator, asking $4,000 per 30 seconds and giving a 2.0 rating guarantee. ■

ON THE DIAL

Upcoming radio specials and new programs or syndicated services.

"The Jazz Show with David Sanborn," a new one-hour weekend contemporary jazz show from NBC Radio Entertainment, New York, starts Jan. 5. Sanborn, who started with the Paul Butterfield Blues Band and now has nine solo albums to his credit, will perform as well as host other jazz musicians. No advertisers signed as yet.

"Diet Coke Presents Live from L.A.," a 60-minute weekly show from LBS Network, New York. Diet Coke is the major sponsor. The show will have music, tv and movie stars before a studio audience taking telephone calls from listeners. No other sponsors yet. LBS Network is a unit of LBS Communications.

"Heart & Soul" is a new 24-hour format from Satellite Music Network, Dallas, geared to urban audiences and the 25-to-49 age group. Researched by Strategic Radio Research, Chicago, it mixes oldies with Motown and contemporary artists with strong cross-over appeal. SMN says initial results on 17 stations show an even split among black and white listeners. No national advertisers yet. ■

REISS'S THESIS

Super Bowl order changeth

By Craig Reiss

The Old Guard sports advertisers are sitting out Super Bowl XX in significant numbers.

The market is weak.

The new multidimensional man is watching prime time.

There's more sports on the air than ever.

And there's no way the Old Guard—especially its U.S. car maker contingent—is going to pay 10% more than last year's $1 million-a-minute to get reasonably good tickets to the game.

As fate would have it, the Old Guard takes its hard line in the season NBC gets the Jan. 26 championship game. All year long the NBC Sports sales force has argued that the soft sports market is the creation of the buyers' propaganda machine. Softness is determined by the lack of buyers, and NBC says if the Old Guard doesn't want it—at its price—the New Guard will.

The way NBC formally announced its Super Bowl was sold out—and at its asking price—betrays just how seriously NBC is taking this latest media showdown.

It's as if NBC decided to rub the sellout in the noses of those who had passed on the game. The secrecy that covered NBC's new Super Bowl client roster—the network said the deals included promotional tie-ins, and it wanted to let the advertisers release their own details—also spoke volumes about what it took to find elasticity in the advertiser market.

The flip side of the NBC I-told-you-so is the assumption that the New Guard simply does not know any better and is paying the freight. Sooner or later, they'll wise up. To which NBC must reply that, by that time, it will cost the Old Guard even more to get back in the game than they saved by dropping out.

So the questions now become: Will NBC's new roster of Super Bowl advertisers stick with sports beyond this one big event, or is NBC dealing with a one-night stand, an aberration in the sports market? Are the new Super Bowl advertisers big enough to make up for the loss of the automotive exclusivity category (exclusivities bring premiums, and such deals usually spread to other, softer, programing). With Stroh bowing out and Miller passing, will Anheuser-Busch keep paying premium rates to freeze out Coors? What advertiser category is strong enough to counter the loss of last year's computer marketer competition? If AT&T retrenches, can GTE Sprint pick up all the slack?

My money usually goes with the guys writing the checks, and the bigger the check they write, the more I bet with them. ■

TV POWER SHARES

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decidedly a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen National Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

NBC's Cosby Show is not only the dominant show on tv, but it continues to beat its direct competition by increasing margins. Cos became the first show this season to score 54 share points. Its 32-point margin of victory last week almost deserves its own category of winner. . .Family Ties, which follows Cosby, is the luckiest show on tv. Ties also is tracking upward. . .Dallas made a 10-share domination jump against its regular competition, an especially impressive surge for such an established show. . .Tell ABC it was losing Cosell and not the poor schedule. Monday Night Football's Bears-Dolphins game gave the show a 26-share domination turnaround; the game had not won its time period in a month before that. . .60 Minutes continues as the strongest, steadiest audience deliverer this side of Cosby. . .Golden Girls has steadied after suffering under the weight of ABC's North and South. It's a certified new hit for NBC. . .Can Perry Mason Returns be far off as a regular series? The NBC made-for-tv movie was the first time-period winner for its Sunday Night Movies in a month, and Perry beat up on the competition. . .Miami Vice had its strongest week in a month, as Sonny Crockett remembered Vietnam, a la Thomas Magnum. . .Dynasty continues rolling along, showing no signs of weakening. . .Murder, She Wrote is back to its usual strength after a slight slip following a preempted week. . .Facts of Life is doing consistently well, although it's no Cosby. . .227, riding the strength of Golden Girls, has recovered from the North and South setbacks. . .Cheers had a 9-share domination rebound last week. . .Gimme a Break keeps winning handily. . .Love Boat makes the charts for the first time in a month, and ABC starts a letter-writing campaign to NBC pleading, "Don't cancel American Almanac." Oh, the power of the network news department in prime time. . .Night Court seems to have settled as a comfortable, though not formidable, winner in its Thursday slot. . .Highway to Heaven blipped two weeks ago, settled back into regular winning margin last week. . .Hotel had not been seen in a month, then comes back to win its time slot against The Equalizer and St. Elsewhere. . .Knots Landing is edging out a narrow victory every week. . .Spenser: For Hire got a new time period and showed its first victory, a 15-share-point domination turnaround.

Black agencies fight for greater recognition and new opportunities

Burrell aims for big time

Tom Burrell now can lure top personnel away from large agencies and other companies, doing to them what they had been doing to him for so long. His 14-year-old agency may have reached this point just in time, now that fewer companies are signing up a minority agency out of a sense of social obligation and fewer talented blacks are willing to make big sacrifices to work for the smaller, black shops. See Page 4.

Bills aim at cigaret ads

WASHINGTON—Senate and House bills were introduced this week that would bar cigaret companies from deducting cigaret ad costs as a business expense. The moves were seen as a response to the American Medical Assn.'s push to ban all cigaret ads (AA, Dec. 12, et seq.). The bills were introduced by Sen. Bill Bradley (D., N.J.) and Rep. Fortney Stark (D., Cal.) in their respective chambers. The Bradley bill would affect only ad costs; the Stark proposal would eliminate the deductibility of all promotional expenses.

SBA gets 'Playboy'

CHICAGO—Playboy has named Smith Burke & Azzam, Baltimore, to handle its $2.8 million consumer account, following the agency's selection to handle the monthly's trade advertising account (AA, Oct. 17). Consumer advertising, which had been in-house, is to be tested on tv and radio here and in New York and Los Angeles for the March through May issues, with results to guide expansion into other markets as well as other issues.

Two vie for BankAmerica

SAN FRANCISCO—BankAmerica Corp. has narrowed the review for an estimated $4 million new corporate-image account to Allen & Dorward and Ketchum Advertising. Speculative creative will be test-marketed, and a winner will be named in January. Grey Advertising here and Keye/Donna/Pearlstein, Los Angeles, also were finalists (AA, Sept. 23).

Austin, Nichols ceo to leave

NEW YORK—Austin, Nichols & Co. president-ceo Marshall Berkowitz will leave that post at yearend as the company undergoes a major restructuring. As a result of a joint venture between its parent, Pernod Ricard, and R.J. Reynolds Industries' Heublein unit, Austin, Nichols now will manage Pernod Ricard's U.S. interests. The joint venture, Boulevard Distillers & Importers, will take over production and marketing of Wild Turkey bourbon; Austin, Nichols' main product; Heublein Spirits already distributes Wild Turkey. Succeeding Mr. Berkowitz is Pierre de Champfleury, formerly exec vp-marketing, Wild Turkey's account, now at Calvillo, Shevack & Partners, is under review (AA, Dec. 16).

Chevy backs 'Drive-Aid'

NEW YORK—General Motors' Chevrolet division, Detroit, will sponsor a "Drive-Aid" rock concert as the latest fund-raiser for Live Aid's African famine-relief efforts. The concert, due Feb. 20, will be co-produced by Radio City Music Hall here and World Wide Sports & Entertain-

Street Talk

The question: Chesebrough-Pond's is the latest advertiser to pull its print media in-house with the intent of using its clout to get magazines to break rate card. Should magazine buying be turned over to negotiations?

Eugene McCarthy, senior vp-executive media director, BBDO, Southfield, Mich.: Magazines are at liberty to do whatever they choose, but they will reap the consequences. If they drop their rate cards, they may be penalized for it in the long run. Magazines have prospered because rate cards eliminated the need to negotiate for space, unlike broadcast media. You will always get magazines that are not in demand that take the risk. But if others do find out, they'll have to drop their rates across the board. It's up to them, but I think it would be harmful.

E. McCARTHY

M. ROSEN

Marcella Rosen, senior vp-media director, N W Ayer, New York: Both from the client and agency side, we've got to make the best deal possible for our clients. When business is bad, we've got to look for better packages. And while we try to do the best we can for all clients, not all situations are the same. Also, this is really not a new concept. It has been very traditional in broadcast to negotiate individual sales. I've always felt that negotiating on behalf of the client was part of our charge.

Paul Zuckerman, senior vp-director of media planning and operations, Doyle Dane Bernbach, New York: I'm dead set against breaking rate cards. We would be negotiating every buy and would never know if we're getting the best price. If magazines come to us with specific proposals, we should evaluate them, but we should never solicit breaking rate card. It would undermine the credibility of the medium, the industry and the client. Breaking rate card would lead to negotiations for positions, adjacencies and leverage—so the strong would get stronger.

P. ZUCKERMAN

Thurman Pierce, vp-U.S. manager of print media, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York: Every time the economy goes down and the market for magazine space gets soft, magazines start dropping their rate cards. There's nothing new about it. Now, magazines are not having a good year and some advertisers and agencies are putting pressure on them. It's a carry-over from tv. But if those rates are broken, agencies have a new obligation that we didn't have before. We must get the client a rate that is as low as anybody else's for the same volume.

Mike Bienstock, vp-associate media director, BBDO, New York: No. We don't seek or encourage magazines to break rate cards. It would be unfair to all our clients. If we were able to negotiate a good deal for one client, others would question why we didn't do it for them. Further, for many small, targeted magazines, it could undermine their profitability. We're not buying the small ones for price or efficiency. We want them for selectivity, position and editorial adjacency. Breaking rate cards is a negative for the whole industry, and I wish it would come to a halt.

M. BIENSTOCK

Marketing to Blacks

Agencies playing for equality from advertisers

By Ed Fitch

In the movie "Guess Who's Coming to Dinner," a classically liberal couple confront their true feelings about blacks when their daughter brings a respected black doctor home as her fiance.

It's time advertisers and black market agencies sat down and broke bread.

Black market agencies have been accepted by general market advertisers and their agencies, but they are not always embraced as equals. And in terms of agency size they are not equals.

Of the 18 agencies listed as black market specialists in the Standard Directory of Advertising Agencies, 15 reported billings. These agencies' combined billings equal $168 million, or the 1984 billings total for Geers Gross Advertising, ranked as the nation's 46th largest agency by Advertising Age.

Granted, these billings do not represent advertisers' total black market spending. Many general market agencies realize part of their billings from black market work, and the agency directory does not list all black market specialists. But the comparison illustrates that if general market companies invite black market agencies to dinner, they would have to provide a booster seat for their guests.

An advertiser that uses size as an excuse to not use a black agency is not putting all of the cards on the table, says Joel P. Martin, president, J.P. Martin Associates, a New York-based agency. "The response 'Your agency is just too small' is used as a shield for people who don't want to get involved.

"If a white man or woman representing an agency of a comparable size as mine went to a client, they could pitch either black market or general market business," she says. "But because I am black, I am assumed to have only one area of expertise and am offered one business opportunity—the black market."

Some black agencies seem content to concentrate their efforts within their specialty. "There's enough business in our own backyard," says Anthony Moore, vp, director-media and research of Chicago-based Proctor & Gardner. "Some want to cross into the general market and some want to grow from within the black market specialty. It depends on what they feel their strength is."

Wanting to expand market horizons is a natural impulse for agency executives. "Most black agency executives received their training in general market agencies, which brings to us an advantage of general market exposure," says Ms. Martin, who launched her agency after leaving McCaffrey & McCall.

In addition, she says, blacks have been forced to understand white society in a way whites have not had to understand the black community. "We offer the best of both worlds."

Many black agencies have seen some of their efforts added to national campaigns. Mingo-Jones developed Kentucky Fried Chicken's national tag line; Uni-World Group's Burger King spots are familiar to any tube addict.

In doing business in both markets, however, the big winner is Burrell Advertising. In addition to select Ford Motor Co., Coca-Cola Co., McDonald's Corp. and Procter & Gamble work that can be seen in any household, the Chicago agency won Jos. Garneau Co.'s general market assignment for Martell. With minorities accounting for 25% of all cognac sales, according to Business Trends Analysts, Commack, N.Y., this probably was a smart move by Garneau.

market and media increase, black shops could see a business boom, says Frank Mingo, president of Mingo-Jones, New York. "More concern, more awareness will lead to more people beginning to say, 'We'll go to the folks with expertise,' " he says.

Mr. Alligood challenges that notion, saying, "The requisite is not whether the agency is black or general. The requisite is that it's an intelligent agency that is handling things in an intelligent and prudent manner." Despite an over-all shaky success record in establishing internal black market units, more agencies may combat the perceived threat of black-owned agencies by forming such groups.

The result, Mr. Lewis says, is that even the most hypocritical media buyer will recognize the value of black media. It fills emotional and informational needs that make it attractive to the black buying public. Consequently, any advertising placed there gets better than average attention, he says.

"I don't understand why [businessmen] can't make that connection," Mr. Lewis says. "They can make a similar connection for the Wall Street Journal and the New York Times and television shows like '60 Minutes,' 'Monday Night Football' and 'Dynasty.' " AA

Directing the right buys

The accompanying charts show the leading black-oriented magazines and the top tv shows among blacks, but a lot can be said between these lines. ADVERTISING AGE went to the media directors of some segmented market agencies to fill out the picture:

Pat Stevenson, vp, media director, J.P. Martin Associates, New York:

"There has not been a lot of talk about the role of black viewers in network erosion. If cable is going to only upscale areas and it is eroding network, then the network viewer profile is skewing more toward minorities, who don't live in areas receiving cable.

"Minority viewership is not eroding and it is becoming more of a factor in programing. Black viewers may be why top shows are doing well. Of course, the efficiency is still not there.

"Black Entertainment TV is out on cable, but it faces the handicap of going only into areas where cable goes. And these are not typically black areas. Minorities have a greater propensity to view tv, and cable went out recognizing that the greatest potential users of product would not be reached.

"Cable needs to look at more of a general market to survive. The face of cable programing will have to change. They have come to the realization that they need more general audience programing and to look at potential audiences.

"Black magazines' problem is that they are not included in general market budgets. This year J.P. Martin positioned Essence as the eighth sister and Jet compared itself to People to illustrate that although they do deliver black people, they deliver people. They want to be considered in general market buys.

"The most recent Scarborough report on black newspapers shows them at 300 strong, covering about 30% of the population. Any place you have a concentration of blacks, there will be a newspaper. Because about 65% of them are represented by black media rep companies, they are not difficult to buy.

"It appears that general ad agencies are starting to recognize that eight-sheets are pretty much ethnic boards. Black agencies and local businesses have always used a lot of eight-sheet, but it seems that national product advertisers are beginning to catch on.

"In radio, we see that audiences are spreading out into other formats because black artists, like Michael Jackson, for example, are being played on them. You have to take a look at the top contemporary stations now, in addition to the traditional black/urban format."

Anthony Moore, vp, media director, research director, Proctor & Gardner, Chicago:

"I think radio is a very efficient way to reach blacks. It's reach is pretty strong, compared to radio for white audiences. You may have 20 stations for white listeners, but only a few for blacks, so listening is concentrated in fewer outlets.

"Because of the programing, you don't have to face a lot of waste. It may be the most efficient black media outlet.

" 'The Cosby Show' is a waste of money as a black market buy. For any show to work, the majority of viewers have to be

Blacks don't look for a mirror in the tube

Black households account for 10% of total tv households and nearly 15% of total tv viewing. The ranking of black-favored programing certainly questions the assumption that black viewers are drawn only to black-oriented shows.

white. So although many black people watch "The Cosby Show," to call it a black market buy would be wrong because there would be a lot of waste for the money."

Nick Howse, vp-media director, Burrell Advertising, Chicago:

"Comparing household ratings, tv shows with blacks in them are viewed in disproportionate numbers in black households. But, I don't think black people watch 'Dynasty' just because Diahann Carroll is on it.

"Across the board there are more media outlets. There was a time when there was just one [radio] station in each market.

Now in medium-size markets there are two and in large markets there are several.

"There are more magazines now too. There was a time when there was only Ebony and Jet. Now there's Essence, Ebony Man, Modern Black Man. I think Ebony Man and Modern Black Man were long overdue because adult black males have been the hardest group to reach.

"Black newspapers had been experiencing growing pains. Now they are becoming aggressive and relevant. They are an increasingly important force.

"The five-year growth curve [for black media] goes almost straight up. There's a good chance [all outlets] will survive.

"There's more commitment now. It used to be a [radio] station would have a couple of bad [ratings] books and they'd sell the station."

David Krieger, exec vp, Adelante Advertising, New York:

"If you have a really major effort, you have to cover every form of media. In our Apollo theater campaign for Dewar's, in addition to using typical media outlets, we used subway, outdoor, poster, brochures, merchandising.

"Media efforts are weakened without point-of-sale support. It's our biggest thrust, because the buyer may be seeing and hearing pretty generic commercials on tv and radio. When you get into the market and reinforce the message at the point where they buy, it can make the difference between whether or not a sale is made."

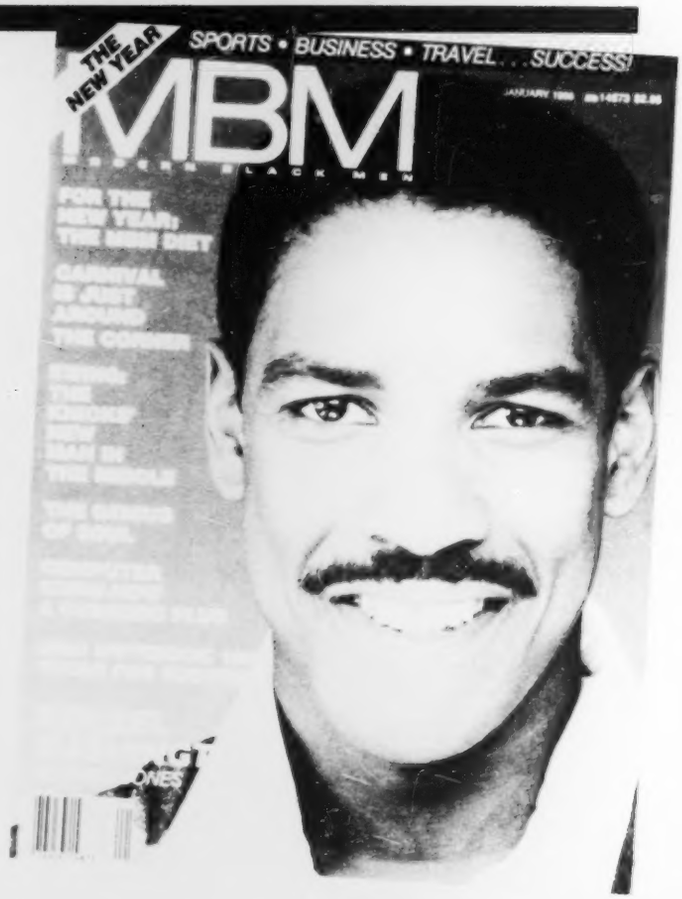
WHO CAN AFFORD TO BE OUT OF THE BLACK?



As an advertiser, can you really afford to ignore your share of the $187 billion black consumer market?

Manufacturers and retailers alike should take a long look at this emerging middle class with increasing new money to spend. Over the past 13 years with wider job opportunities, rising income and increased schooling, we have a new status and we are spending money on luxury items and especially automobiles, clothing, electronic equipment, and travel to prove it!

MBM can help its advertisers to obtain and hold on to their share of this $187 billion market by providing the attention that our brand conscious black male consumer market requires.

Our market consists of more than 28 million people, a rapidly upward mobile middle-class of more than 10 million people and more than one million young blacks attending colleges and universities.

MBM is written, designed and published to serve the more than 4 million upwardly mobile black males. Our editorial focus is upon all areas of the black man's interests and his upwardly mobile lifestyle. Editorial content runs the gamut of people, news, fashion, health/fitness/grooming, sports, the arts, travel and entertainment.

What this boils down to is that MBM can help you to grasp your share of this overwhelming disposable income that black middle-class males have obtained. In 1973, disposable income for blacks stood at $64 billion. Now the figure has reached $187 billion.

Who can afford to be out of the black?

Addressing a strong customer franchise is one thing; creating an execution that speaks to both the minority segment and general market is another. "The approach Burrell used for Martell fit the psychic expectations of both markets," Ms. Martin says. "It's a life-style approach anyone can identify with. The desire to do, be and have the best."

J.P. Martin's Anheuser-Busch corporate work was created for the black market, she says, "but that doesn't mean it's not appropriate for the general market. In some sense, black market advertising has to talk to every market because a company's advertising cannot be objectionable."

Vince Cullers, president of Vince Cullers Advertising, Chicago, agrees, saying a recent spot his agency did for Amoco Oil tested equally well in the general and black markets. "You have to look at well-targeted efforts without offending any part of the buying market."

In creating a spot that crosses into the general market, he says, it may be difficult not to offend portions of the black market. "Some blacks might react favorably to campaigns that position us as part of the greater scheme of things, but this approach might insult a big segment."

Both Ms. Martin and Mr. Cullers say spots that cross into both markets are more efficient because they deliver a larger audience at a one-spot production cost. "For this reason, agencies that understand the black and general markets should be given

Promotion and pr not lost on market

The old stool metaphor is not lost on some members of the black marketing movement. The saw says if one leg is cut, the stool will tip over. Moving products through the black consumer market is no different, they say, and advertising is only one leg.

"A lot of companies will hire a black market ad agency and feel they have reached the black consuming market," says C. Roy Jackson, director, Flair Communications, Chicago, and head of the promotion company's segmented market division. "You reach black consumers in many ways—one way is advertising, another is promotion."

Approaching the black consumer market through promotions is like traveling uncharted terrain. "Promotion companies would set up booths at fairs and hand blacks shopping bags and that would be the extent of their efforts to reach blacks through promotions," he says.

Yet blacks are spontaneous and brand-conscious buyers, qualities that complement promotion's immediacy, Mr. Jackson says. "You can reach them at the instant they exercise their buying power."

Promotions also permit finely targeted marketing efforts, a plus in reaching the urban-based black populace and one that could become a larger factor as the black population distributes itself further across the economic spectrum.

"We created a promotion for Beatrice that recognized the leading 100 black businesswomen," he says. "We are using them as a means to spread information to their communities; the impact of the promotion will filter down to their associates and friends."

Another Flair promotion for Beatrice will enter the market through black churches, another strong information outlet.

Another leg of the communications stool plays a large role, says Charles Richardson, Tri-Ad Consultants, a New York-based ethnic marketing services company. "Public relations efforts tell the public a specific company is supporting this group, energizing a drum and getting the public talking about a company. If you start people talking, it will ripple outward."

Tri-Ad administers Brown & Williamson's Hot Line on Jobs program, which he says illustrates pr's ability to generate good will. "It's not advertising and it only influences sales incidentally," he says. "These non-exploitative programs carry a large residual impact of sincerity in speaking to minorities. They give back to the community what has already come to [companies] in sales, and indicates a company is here to stay."

Blacks notice companies' community-oriented activities and respond in kind, Mr. Richardson says. "They are sophisticated and are aware of manufacturers' motives."

Of course, boosting sales can be an information campaign's prime objective. For example, "Silverado" was not advertised to the black community as having a black actor, he says. "If you get that fact into the black community, it can have an enormous impact on box office receipts."

Pr does have its place, and it is not to push product categories in which blacks are the major consumers. Here the heavy sell is more appropriate, Mr. Richardson says. "The softer sell tells the market the company is out there. Its message is something different than our product is better than the next guy's."

Flair's Mr. Jackson has no doubts about promotions' ability to sell goods. "Electronic media help in terms of moving merchandise," he says, "but promotions actually move merchandise off the shelves."

He says he will not compete with agencies for business, however, opting to work through them. "I'm not in electronic media and they are not specializing in promotions. Black agencies don't handle promotions because it involves a large investment in money, people and time. It is a specialized and sensitive area of communications."

And every stool needs at least three legs. —E.F.

Media outlets tune in to needs

So, Mr. and Ms. Marketing Director, you think you've got it bad, sitting in New York or Chicago, wanting to reach the black consumer market and complaining the major black agencies you have approached already have a client in your product category.

Well, picture yourself in Philadelphia, Houston or Detroit—all areas with sizable black populations and fewer or no black market agencies.

According to Lee Zapis, director-operations, at WZAK (fm) in Cleveland, advertisers in smaller markets can turn to the Yellow Pages for help, but they should look under the "Radio stations and broadcasting companies" heading.

"Out of necessity, many black media function in the same fashion as black agencies, often providing creative services, mailing lists, research data and promotional vehicles."

The only alternatives general market advertising agencies offer is to run a general market ad in targeted media or tailor ads to the segment—options that may work as long as the product is the only one being presented to the black buying public, he says.

In lieu of specialized black market agencies, black-oriented media's familiarity with the segment provides them with the expertise to more effectively reach blacks, Mr. Zapis says. "Also, disc jockeys carry a lot of clout in the black community and can be very effective product spokespersons."

Mr. Zapis says he identifies with all of the problems black agencies face. Although blacks comprise about 20% of the Cleveland metropolitan area and about 50% of the city itself, "we're faced with a constant educational process, the same challenge black market agencies confront," he says.

"Very few general market advertisers come to us without prodding," Mr. Zapis says. "You get the black personal care marketers and liquor companies, but there is no 'black' toothpaste, so you don't have those kinds of accounts walk through the door on their own."

Once advertisers run a black market ad, they typically become long-term customers, he says. One reason is the results are visible. "They see the return on their effort in the increased number of black consumers walking the aisles of their stores." —E.F.

TAKE THIS AD FOR WHAT IT'S WORTH.

Namely, the $2 billion northeast Ohio blacks spend on consumer goods alone every year.

If you decide to pursue this gold mine, WZAK-FM is your best marketing consultant.

WZAK is the top black/urban music station in Ohio. We speak to blacks. And blacks respond. Both through the airwaves, and through the pages of Rhythm & News, WZAK's magazine of black entertainment.

Out of this natural kinship comes a level of understanding of Ohio blacks' lifestyles and priorities you can't find anywhere else.

Because there's no room in your black marketing strategy for conjecture, WZAK offers the specialized research you need to target your audience. The prime mailing lists that reach them where they live. And the resources to pinpoint what makes them buy. Clearly. Without guesswork.

Before you talk to northeast Ohio blacks, talk to the one company that's firmly in touch with them: WZAK-FM.

What it's worth is $2 billion in unmined black gold.

the opportunity to pitch more business," Ms. Martin says.

Minority agency executives say their shops are very capable of working in both markets. Many marketers' efforts to reach the minority segment are best described as putting a black face in a general market campaign, says David Krieger, exec vp, New York-based Adelante Advertising. "While you may reach the segmented audience with general market campaigns and media placements, you're not talking to them."

More than creative expertise is at question, Ms. Martin says. Pr efforts, promotions, distribution checks, "all of the strategies that guarantee a product's market success must be addressed. Distribution is so important because many of the best selling brands in the black market are the only ones distributed to it."

Black agencies also are more familiar with segmented media, Ms. Martin says. "A lot of agencies lose interest in smaller media vehicles, meaning black media."

Any major agency has thousands of employes, Mr. Krieger says, "so you know some of them are black, Hispanic, Arab. It's not that they are insulated, it's just not their orientation."

Black agencies still appear to be struggling to win business in their own specialty, much less branch into the general market.

"Black agencies are three times as hard pressed to state their case and therein lies enormous frustration," says Peggy Seats, Proctor & Gardner's marketing manager. That case, most simply put, is that the black market exists and deserves to be addressed in advertising.

A look at the big buying picture explains black agency executives' frustration. Black consumer expenditures should reach $203 billion in 1985, according to Market Research Bureau, New York.

"If you look at the dollars spent by blacks and the product usage indexes, it's frustrating when you're not even given a shot to pitch for some business," Ms. Martin says. "In certain categories—music, fashion, electronics, cooking, baby food, orange juice, malt liquor and many more—blacks are trendsetters. A campaign to the black market can spread to the general market. In many instances blacks drive the category."

Ms. Seats says many marketers "still have a problem investing in the market. It will take a more critical examination on their part of the bottom line."

Part of the problem is the number of "lame duck advertisers," Mr. Moore says. "They ask the question of whether they want to take on what they perceive to be a problem area. True marketers look toward opportunities."

This is why black agencies are being given more business opportunities, Mr. Cullers says. "Companies are turning to the black market because there are no other places for them to go to increase their business."

Still, the over-all feeling is one of frustration. "Nobody said it was going to be easy," Ms. Martin says. "Black agencies are not asking for handouts, just to be given an opportunity." Dinner, anyone?

TV AVAILS

A weekly listing of tv programming that still has commercial availabilities open in the next few weeks.

"WWF Network," a combination package of all six World Wrestling Federation broadcast and cable shows, including WWF Championship, All-Star and Super Star over the air, All-American, Prime Time and TNT on USA Network. Titan Sports, Greenwich, Conn., handles. The network package has 90% U.S. household unduplicated coverage. Up to two minutes per show per week still are available at $35,000 per 30 seconds. The shows are being sold individually as well. WWF guarantees an 11 national rating and will negotiate demographic guarantees. Warner-Lambert, Valvoline, Coleco and LJN Toys are already in the shows.

"Boys Town," a made-for-tv updating of the Mickey Rooney classic, is being produced by Columbia Pictures and syndicated by LBS Communications, New York, for an April run. Station clearances are being completed now and the LBS sales force will hit the streets with "Boys Town" next week. No advertisers are signed yet. LBS is asking $85,000 per 30 seconds and is guaranteeing a 15 national household rating. It expects 90% U.S. coverage by airdate. The show stars Art Carney.

World Wrestling heavyweight champion Hulk Hogan stars on "WWF Network."

"America's Top 10," the Casey Kasem-hosted perennial weekly series, has time left through December at $16,000 per 30 seconds. All American Television, New York, handles distribution and sales. The show is carried in 85% of the U.S. Mars, Noxell and Nabisco are three of the regular sponsors of the music countdown show.

"New York Hot Tracks," a music-video show hosted by former New York deejay Carlos DeJesus and concentrating on rhythm and blues videos, has spots open through December. All American Television, New York, is handling sales for the show, which has cleared 65% of the U.S. The U.S. Army and Coca-Cola already are regular sponsors. All American is asking $4,500 per 30 seconds.

"Black Achievement Awards," a special syndicated by Carl Meyers Associates, New York, to 94 stations for a play date in February, already has Miller Brewing as its major sponsor and AT&T, Ford Motor Co. and Burger King as participants. Johnson Publishing Co., Chicago, made the nominations for the awards, and the winners were selected by an "all-star panel of black opinion leaders." No prices were revealed. ■

Upcoming radio specials and new programs or syndicated services.

"Live from the Hard Rock Cafe," a 90-minute monthly live show from NBC Radio Entertainment, New York, starting Feb. 2 at 8:30 p.m. (ET). David Letterman's band leader Paul Shaffer is the host. The show comes from New York's Hard Rock Cafe. Heineken is the major sponsor, but there are still availabilities. Ad closing is Jan. 20.

P. Shaffer

"The Pat Benatar Story" airs Dec. 21 as the latest edition of United Stations Programming Network's 90-minute "Hot Rocks" series of specials. Faberge's Babe cologne is a major sponsor. The specials combine interviews with the featured star and the performer's music. United Stations ran 15 "Hot Rocks" in 1985, and plans to expand the series next year.

"Emmylou Harris' Golden Decade" is the New Year's Day holiday special in the "Country Six Pack" series from United Stations Programming Network, New York. The special already is cleared "by most of the Arbitron-rated top country stations in the nation on an exclusive market basis," according to USPN. The "Country Six Pack" series this year has had major sponsors such as Allstate, Ford Motorcraft, Holiday Inn, Johnson & Johnson, Ace Hardware and Remington shavers.

"Top 85 of '85," is a series of countdown shows featuring the top 1985 hits for each of Dallas-based Satellite Music Network's formats. The formats include Country Coast-To-Coast, StarStation adult contemporary, StarDust traditional/nostalgia, Heart & Soul urban and Rock 'n' Hits top 40. The series has been cleared on 550 stations. Regular advertisers include Warner-Lambert's Dentyne, Sears, AT&T and Dial soap. The series airs on New Year's Day.

"Legends of Rock," a monthly series of two-hour specials featuring a particular rock artist, produced and distributed by NBC Radio Entertainment, New York. Jethro Tull will be featured the weekend of Jan. 17, and the ad closing date is Jan. 6. Paul McCartney will be showcased in February, with a Feb. 3 ad closing date. NBC did not report any current sponsors. ■

Beware of small video ideas

By Craig Reiss

With most videocassette recorder playbacks going to commercial-free movies, exercise tapes or time-shifting of daytime soaps, advertisers are fretting over being frozen out of this emerging medium with all the right socioeconomic demographics and remote-control zappers.

When advertisers fret, the Great Idea Guys pop up with solutions that on paper make all the sense in the world. But when it comes to any form of tv, A plus B rarely equals C.

Since there's no traditional way to measure efficiencies in home-video advertising, the Great Idea Guys usually propose something like this: Make a video about your product category, use your products in the show and sell it only to your target audience. What they never tell you is that, in tv, small ideas beget small results.

Targeting a segment of an audience through a medium that hasn't reached maturity is not worth a premium price. Getting there first with a small idea is worth nothing at all. You can't patent programming.

Few media translate well into other media, especially into tv. Take Glenmore Distillers' how-to video on bartending. You're watching it to learn how to mix a drink. The video says a jigger of this, a dash of that. You don't catch it the first time, so you have to hit stop, rewind, cue up and play back. The printed page needs no rewinding.

But tv in all its forms is a mass medium. It is weakest, both in program quality and audience delivery, as an information vehicle. If you're going to play with home video, pull out the stops. Go for the biggest idea. Get Paramount to let you underwrite the entire collection of "Star Trek" tv episodes to retail for $5 each, and toss in a funny high-production commercial as a lead-in. That probably makes no economic sense either, but it would work. ■

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decisively a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

NBC'S Cosby Show continues to lick the competition but no longer by increasing margins. The once hugely popular Magnum P.I on CBS refuses to die under the onslaught from Cos and Family Ties, the second most popular show on tv. Both shows took a slight dip last week as Magnum added a full three share points. . .the perennial powerhouse Dallas built its share lead by four points from the previous week proving once again that Bobby Ewing's absence is not a hit-destroyer. . .60 Minutes took a tumble and not because Ripley's over at ABC is suddenly popular. An NFL overrun plundered its audience for the first half hour. But when Brent left the airwaves audiences quickly tuned into Mike, giving the tried-and-true winner a resounding win over NBC's Silver Spoons. . .Saturday night continues to be NBC night by impressive margins. CBS tried an end-run at the dynamic duo on NBC, Golden Girls and 227, but to little avail. The CBS movie Victor/Victoria was beaten by over a dozen share points. ABC's Lady Blue mustered a 19 share for its swan song against the NBC hits. NBC's Hunter is on a clear winning track, handily beating the fading Love Boat by over 8 share points. . .Cheers on NBC is obviously getting "hurt" by a building Dynasty II:The Colbys on Thursday. Of course "hurt" is a relative term here: Cheers and Night Court beat number two show Simon and Simon by ten and six share points, respectively. . .The critics hated it, but the audience, as usual, was kinder. CBS's Alice in Wonderland, Part 1 obliterated a couple of dogs on NBC and ABC by a huge nine share-point margin. It took the L.A.Rams and the Forty-Niners on Monday Night Football to tackle little Alice. The game beat the last hour of the CBS movie by three points. The folks at ABC were more than pleased not to have to face the formidable regularly scheduled series on CBS. With a few exceptions, MNF usually loses by a few share points to Cagney and Lacey et al. . .NBC's Highway to Heaven stumbled under the weight of Mary on CBS. The premiere of Mary Tyler Moore's new comedy pulled a remarkable 26 share.

Bonuses, holidays vary

Agencies exercise their Santa clause

An Advertising Age roundup

Was it Scrooge or Santa Claus giving out ad agency Christmas bonuses this year? Well, it depends upon where you work. And there didn't seem to be any direct correlation between what kind of year the agency had and how generous it was to its employes.

Many retailers lament six lost shopping days as the Christmas buying season enters its final hours. Page 3.

Doyle Dane Bernbach's New York office, for example, did not exactly have a terrific year (AA, Dec. 9), but employes got their traditional bonus of one week's salary anyway.

On the other hand, Ketchum Advertising/San Francisco had a great year but skipped its usual practice of giving employes coupons for a free turkey at client Safeway Stores, Oakland.

New York-based Grey Advertising, which ended the year with a super $100 million in new-business gains, also did not alter its usual practice of performance-related bonuses. But employes will be off Dec. 23, 24, 25 and New Year's Day.

Among the more generous agencies was Leo Burnett Co., which gave employes a percentage-of-salary bonus that an agency spokesman would only say was "substantial." Sources say it was 20% for most employes and higher for top management.

Also, Burnett client United Airlines, Elk Grove Village, Ill., gave the Chicago-based agency 20 pairs of tickets good for round-trip flights anywhere in the world United flies. These were awarded through a drawing.

The agency will be closed Dec. 24 and 25 and Jan. 1, with regular business hours observed on other days.

Performance-related bonuses, of course, continue at many agencies.

Among the more unusual formulas came one from Cramer-Krasselt, Chicago, which gives employes $1 for every year the agency has been in business—$87 this year. The agency will be closed from noon Christmas Eve and all day Christmas Day, as well as Tuesday and Wednesday of New Year's week.

Where's Herb? Lost in McD.L.T. shuffle

By BRIAN MORAN

McDonald's Corp.'s avalanche of advertising and discount coupons for its McD.L.T. sandwich has roadblocked the first phase of Burger King's nationwide "search" for Herb.

Burger King's month-old quest for the mythical character who has never visited its restaurants, via J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, has apparently refocused some consumer attention on the No. 2 hamburger chain. Independent BK franchisees generally praise the Herb concept as an awareness-building novelty. But BK operators say the overwhelming McD.L.T. barrage from No. 1 McDonald's has thwarted Herb's ability to generate new business.

Fueling Big Mac's ambush of Herb is its estimated $5.5 million-a-week tv ad budget—about 2½ times BK's media weight for Herb—and coupons offering customers free McD.L.Ts. Many BK franchisees have decided to honor the competitor's coupons to keep customers from switching, but McDonald's new "Whopper Stopper" product is off to a strong start.

McDonald's original marketing plan had called for a four-week introductory campaign for the McD.L.T., which was to have been followed Nov. 25 by Chicken McNugget spots (AA, Nov. 11). But rather than slow the new sandwich's momentum, McDonald's has continued to focus tv advertising on the product beyond that date.

"We've never witnessed a bombardment like this [from McDonald's] before," said David Stein, a Burger King franchisee in Jacksonville, Fla. "It's totally blunted Herb so far."

Early awareness of the Herb campaign among customers is nearly as high as for BK's original "Battle of the burgers" campaign three years ago, said Joyce Meyers, a spokeswoman for Miami-based Burger King. But the Herb effort so far has fallen way short of approaching "Battle's" near-overnight sales gains. And BK franchisees are not forecasting any quick sales bursts as the Herb search continues.

"We didn't anticipate McDonald's coming in and

Burger King is hoping to hold off Big Mac's megabuck onslaught with new tv spots offering 39¢ burgers and other discounts to customers who visit BK outlets and proclaim, "I'm not Herb." J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, handles.

Oliver may bring Right stuff to FTC

By STEVEN W. COLFORD

WASHINGTON—President Reagan's long-awaited nomination last week of political loyalist Daniel Oliver to head the Federal Trade Commission left ad industry leaders puzzled about everything but his politics and the probable continuation of current FTC policies.

Mr. Oliver had been considered the front-runner for months to replace James Miller III as FTC chairman, and initial ad industry reaction to his nomination was predictably positive.

D. Oliver

But little is known about Mr. Oliver's views on advertising issues.

His track record at previous Reagan administration posts suggests that his ultraconservative views were ultimately unpalatable to his Republican superiors at the Education

A-B search for Mich agency not all in family

ST. LOUIS—Anheuser-Busch, in evaluating its $35 million-to-$40 million Michelob beer account at Ted Bates Advertising/New York (AA, Nov. 25), reportedly has looked at presentations from a few New York agencies outside the A-B family. Those agencies are said to include the previously reported Young & Rubicam, as well as Doyle Dane Bernbach and Saatchi & Saatchi Compton. However, incumbent Bates and Michelob Light agency Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago, still are said to be the leading contenders for the account in a group that also includes A-B agencies D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles and TBWA Advertising here, as well as the Bloom Agency, Dallas.

Nynex keeps 4 agencies on line, disconnects 5

NEW YORK—Nynex Corp. has narrowed to four the field of nine agencies contending for the regional telephone company's $10 million corporate account (AA, Nov. 11). Those agencies still said to be in the race are BBDO; Chiat/Day; Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, and incumbent Young & Rubicam. Not making the cut were Foote, Cone & Belding; Grey Advertising; HBM/Creamer; Kenyon & Eckhardt, and Scali, McCabe, Sloves. A decision is expected by Jan. 15.

Minolta has surprise play for Super Bowl

RAMSEY, N.J.—Minolta Corp.'s business equipment division is planning its own Super Bowl XX surprise, when it airs two spots for its new EP50 personal copier. Spokesman Tony Randall co-stars with a mystery guest, "Uncle Ebeneezer," whose identity viewers are to guess. Minolta says the mystery guest is as well known as Mr. Randall, has appeared with him before and "has also been seen previously in copier commercials" (Jack Klugman, anyone?). Local Minolta dealers are to reward winners. Bozell & Jacobs, New York, handles.

Marketers shopping for stars

By SCOTT HUME and NANCY GIGES

That other shopping season, the celebrity shopping season, also is nearing its close as advertisers and agencies seek to sign famous names and faces for next year's first quarter.

Some of the potential matchups make clear sense, such as Pepsi-Cola's effort to snare Don Johnson, star of tv's hottest show, "Miami Vice." Others, such as McDonald's Corp.'s attempt to sign opera star Luciano Pavarotti, are more surprising.

Despite the abundance of celebrities in advertising, not everyone is interested. Mr. Pavarotti responded to McDonald's recent inquiry with what his manager called an "emphatic no." The ro-

Ultra Pampers to cap P&G's diaper drive

By LAURIE FREEMAN

Procter & Gamble, which has committed $500 million to shoring up its share of the disposable-diaper market, hopes to complete the effort next year with the national introduction of Ultra Pampers.

That will add a third national brand to P&G's lineup, which already includes New Pampers and the redesigned, thicker Luvs Baby Pants. The performance of these brands has stemmed the Cincinnati-based company's steady loss of share in the highly competitive $2.7 billion disposable-diaper market, analysts say.

P&G remains the market leader with a total share of 52.5%, up five percentage points in the last four months. Much of the gain is attributed to Luvs, because Ultra Pampers have been available only in a seven-state, midwestern area (AA, Oct. 21, et seq.).

Kimberly-Clark Corp.'s Huggies brand has held steady at a 34% share. Sources say P&G has gained its share points at the expense of private-label marketers rather than K-C, which leads in the premium-diaper category.

Paper industry sources say Neenah, Wis.-based K-C's strong position is "a bit surprising," because the company has put the retail trade on a strict Huggies allocation system for much of the fourth quarter of this year.

Retailers are allowed to buy limited quantities while the company retools its machines to make Huggies Extra Absorbent Medium 40s, a thicker, extra-absorbent diaper with an elastic waistband.

K-C has said it expects Huggies Medium 40s will be available nationally by yearend (AA, March 25), with continued advertising support from Ogilvy & Mather, New York.

P&G briefly tested Ultra Pampers in parts of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Missouri and Ohio, supported by tv and print ads themed "Ultra Pampers are the driest diaper ever for your driest baby ever." D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, is Pampers' agency.

Dancer Fitzgerald Sample handles Luvs.

P&G would not say how it plans to position or advertise Ultra Pampers, which will be on shelves beside New Pampers. In test markets, the two brands got separate but similar ad campaigns.

Ultra Pampers is a fully shaped, premium diaper with an inner core that is "concentrated to absorb more wetness" without added bulk, a P&G spokeswoman said.

Some industry executives question whether P&G can convince consumers the thinner Ultra Pamper diaper is as absorbent as a "thick" diaper such as New Pampers.

"The jury is still out on whether mothers will accept something thin. The thin diaper works, but consumers must be confused over which diaper they should be using," one paper industry source said.

P&G is "hedging its bet" on Ultra Pampers, he added. Its new diaper-manufacturing equipment can make the thick New Pampers or the thin Ultra Pampers.

The P&G spokeswoman said Ultra Pampers will be sold in "giant" packs that hold either 64-count large superabsorbency diapers or 96-count medium superabsorbency diapers.#

Quaker tries again

'All-family cereal' set for '86

By JULIE FRANZ

CHICAGO—Quaker Oats Co. is readying its first introduction into the $4 billion ready-to-eat cereal market since its ill-fated Mr. T bowed in late 1984.

Quaker Oh's will be moved into East Coast markets in January.

Positioned as an "all-family cereal," the two-flavor line will receive support via tv and couponed freestanding inserts breaking during the first quarter. Backer & Spielvogel handles.

A Quaker spokesman wouldn't comment on the product before its introduction.

Quaker Oats' new Oh's cereal, the company's first ready-to-eat cereal introduction in more than a year, will be backed by tv and couponed, freestanding newspaper inserts. Backer & Spielvogel, Chicago, handles.

Print ads that were used in test markets (Marion, Ind., and possibly others) say the rice-and-honey cereal is "crunchy rings of corn and oats filled with delicious bits of nut or graham. Lots of good things in the middle...will make your whole family say, 'Oh!' "

Quaker's share of the ready-to-eat cereal market has been slipping steadily from the 8.6% share it posted in 1984. That slippage may be no fault of Quaker's, since Kellogg Co., Battle Creek, Mich., has such a stranglehold on the market with its 43% share, said John Maxwell, food-industry analyst with Furman Selz Mager Dietz & Birney, New York.

Quaker stayed out of the ready-to-eat cereal fray this year in favor of building on its flagship brand, Quaker Oats. The company now boasts a line of 20 oat products, both long-cooking and instant, up from only two in 1980.

The company also is testing in the Dallas market a premium-price, four-item line of Fruit n' Cream hot breakfast cereals based on its successful "peaches & cream" and "strawberries & cream" instant-oatmeal flavors.

Quaker's presweetened Mr. T cereal, introduced at the height of the licensed-character cereal craze, fell by the wayside as the market evaporated, analysts said (AA, June 25, '84, et seq.). Licensed cereals typically have a shelf life of 18 months and rarely achieve market share of more than 1%, one analyst said.

Backed by $10 million in tv and print, via Backer, Quaker cut the Mr. T cereal's budget in January of this year after the product had been on shelves only five months.

The company has just completed its multi-million-dollar "Where's the Cap'n" promotion for its Cap'n Crunch cereal, the best selling brand in Quaker's cereal line (AA, Sept. 9).

Sources estimate Quaker spent between $6 million and $10 million on the promotion, which removed the Cap'n's likeness from cereal boxes starting Sept. 1. Three sets of clues to the Cap'n's whereabouts were printed on the back of cereal boxes. His location was revealed Dec. 14 during a two-minute tv spot airing simultaneously on the three major networks.

Backer also handles the Cap'n Crunch brand.#

Dailies see increases

NEW YORK—September was a good month for the newspapers measured by Media Records Inc. for the ADVERTISING AGE Flash Report of newspaper advertising investments.

Spending was up in 13 of 16 categories in the newspapers measured by MRI. The data do not include September '84 or September '85 measurements of the Philadelphia Inquirer and Daily News, which were shut by a strike during September.

Leading the gainers in dollar volume were department stores, up 9.3% ($7.6 million) to $89.5 million. Food stores and general-merchandise stores followed closely, with a 23.6% hike ($5.1 million) to $26.7 million and a 14.4% increase ($5 million) to $40.2 million, respectively.

Other gainers included computer stores and supplies, up 14.6% to $4.9 million; radio-tv-phonograph-record retailers, up 27% to $17.1 million; alcoholic beverage advertisers, up 15.7% to $2.4 million; camera, photo supplies and service retailers, up 51.9% to $488,146; publishing and media advertisers, up 8.1% to $14.1 million; cigaret advertisers, up 33.9% to $7.1 million; airlines, up 34.2% to $12.8 million; new passenger car advertisers, up 30.5% to $13.2 million; banks and trust companies, up 34% to $7 million, and stock, bond and investment houses, up 42.4% to $1.9 million.

Losing categories included amusements, down 2.4% to $23.8 million; computers, equipment and services, off 20.4% to $2.6 million, and public service utilities and commissions, down 1.2% to $5.6 million.#

Young & Rubicam, New York, used line art effectively in this ad for Nynex Corp.'s data products and services. Group creative director, John Nieman; associate creative director, Jim Hayman; copy supervisor, Jean Kondek; art supervisor, Matt Basile.

Best of Press selections are made by a committee of three: Hank Simons, vp-creative director of the Newspaper Advertising Bureau; James Dunaway, vp-information at the bureau, and William F. Gloede, ADVERTISING AGE's newspaper industry reporter. National System Inc., St. Louis, provides tear sheets to the Newspaper Advertising Bureau for much of this work. Agencies, clients and newspapers are invited to submit ads for review. Submissions should be sent to Mr. Gloede in AA's New York bureau.

Bartels & Carstens, St. Louis created a perfect marriage of a sale event and the sale merchandise by dressing an anniversary candle in a business suit to celebrate the 109th anniversary of Boyd's, a St. Louis department store chain. Creative directors, David Bartels and Donn Carstens; copywriter, Cathy Williams; art director, David Bartels; illustrator, George Stravinos.

Ally & Gargano, New York, used space effectively by running this two-part ad for Federal Express on the lower portion of facing pages in newspapers across the country. Art director, Cathiann Mooney; copywriter, Ken Mandelbaum; photographer, Robert Ammirati.

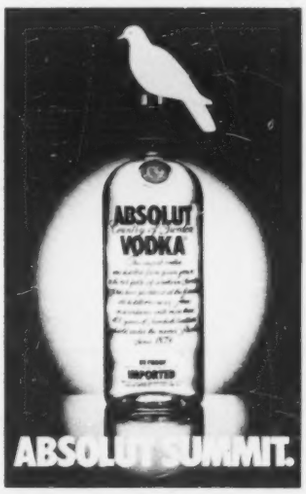
We agree—what a bore. A Federal Excise Tax increase goes into effect October 1 that will raise prices on all distilled spirits, including your beloved Kahlua. So, starting October 1, Kahlua will cost more—with our apologies.
But there's a loophole. Stock up on Kahlua before that taxing date, and you'll save yourself a bundle.
Look for the Kahlua display your neighborhood retailer is featuring. And pick up all the Kahlua you want at the pre-tax price.
Ah, revenge is sweet.
Kahlua

Eisaman, Johns & Laws, Los Angeles, also took a timely approach with this advertisement for Maidstone Wine & Spirits' Kahlua liquor by running the ad immediately prior to the increase in the federal excise tax on distilled spirits. Associate creative directors: Andrea Giambrone and Joel Gilman.



TBWA Advertising, New York, tied an ad for Absolut vodka to the Reagan/Gorbachev summit by running this ad as the meeting was in progress. Creative directors, Arnie Arlow and Peter Lubalin; art director, Geoff Hayes; copywriter, Evert Cilliers; photographer, Steve Bronstein.

Polaroid puts BBDO in focus

By STEWART ALTER

There was a most welcome gift for BBDO Inc. president Tom Clark on Christmas Day: A phone call from Peter Eichorn, Polaroid Corp.'s vp-North American marketing operations, telling him BBDO had won Polaroid's estimated $45 million consumer-photography account.

Pitching the account besides BBDO were Della Femina, Travisano & Partners; Needham Harper Worldwide, and Ogilvy & Mather, all New York. O&M recently had won the Polaroid account in Latin America (AA, Dec. 23), consolidating its position as the agency for all Polaroid business outside the U.S.

Cambridge, Mass.-based Polaroid had announced that it was considering those four agencies for its new 7000 photographic system, and possibly for the whole consumer-photography account as well. Ally & Gargano, New York, the incumbent, resigned the business rather than participate in the review (AA, Nov. 4). Ad spending for that new system is expected to be about $30 million.

The four agencies made creative presentations on how they would handle the 7000 system, said Mr. Clark. "We didn't show an array of creative ideas. We showed one creative concept which we extended and recommended that they do," he said of BBDO's approach, noting that the advertising

Yule sales end with a flourish

When the number crunchers add up their Christmas sales figures, most retail chain stores are expected to show increases of 6% to 8% compared with last year.

But while sales gains were posted over a sluggish 1984, major retailers found that their yuletide "season" was basically confined to four days—the two days right after Thanksgiving and the last two days before Christmas.

There were six fewer shopping days between Thanksgiving and Christmas this year, but the strong surge in last-minute shopping boosted sales over year-ago figures in most cases. And retailers, who a year ago had to improvise special sales and promotions just to drum up consumer traffic, this year planned their promotions, but had to ride out the anxiety of generally

Y&R ends year with $12M win from AHP

NEW YORK—American Home Products' American Home Foods and Boyle-Midway divisions have assigned Mama Leone's jarred pasta and Holiday insecticides, respectively, to Young & Rubicam. Y&R wins an estimated $10 million to $12 million in billings. The Mama Leone's line is a new product that has been quietly testing in the burgeoning jarred pasta category (AA, Dec. 2). The line, which had no previous agency of record, will be expanded into regional and then national distribution, eventually

Adman of the year

GM's visionary

Roger Smith steers drive to market-oriented future

By JESSE SNYDER

Roger Bonham Smith, a General Motors Corp. chairman who pictures himself as an explorer leading an odyssey into the 21st Century, is ADVERTISING AGE's 1986 Adman of the Year.

It is not a commanding on-air presence that won this honor for Mr. Smith. Instead, it's his long-range vision, his efforts to give the world's largest manufacturing company a new marketing orientation and his determination to overcome formidable obstacles and internal inertia.

He has embraced a view of the world that Detroit-based GM and other U.S. auto makers will inherit, and stamped his vision on every aspect of the $90 billion company.

Unlike 1983 Adman of the Year Lee Iacocca, whose series of commercials as Chrysler chairman made him America's most recognizable businessman and a symbol of Chrysler's resurgence, Mr. Smith rarely involves himself in GM's advertising.

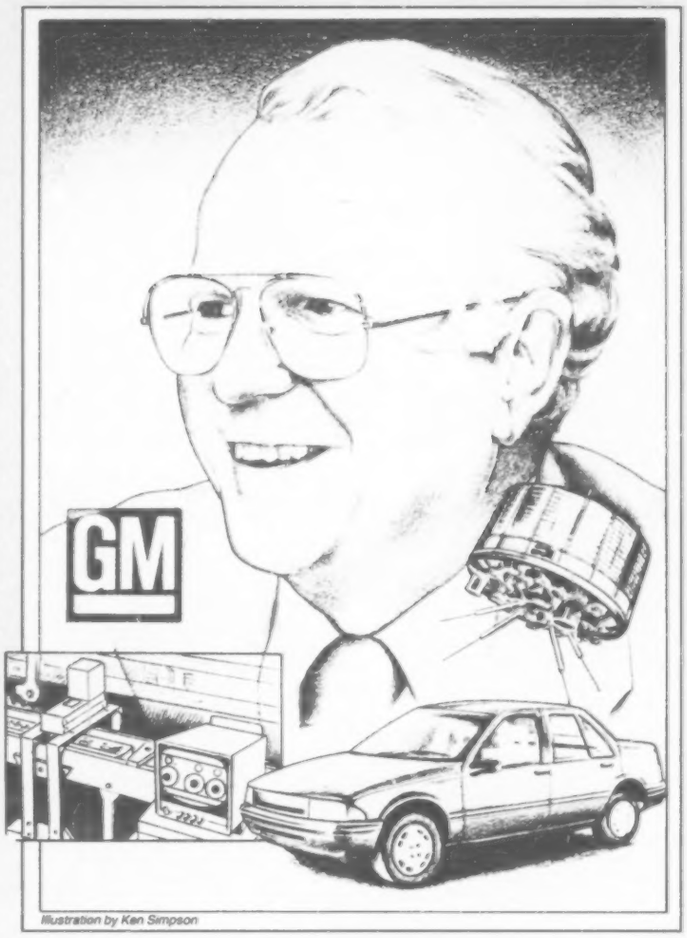

Illustration by Ken Simpson

But he made an exception for "The GM Odyssey: Science, not fiction," a new corporate campaign now breaking via N W Ayer.

"I may have had a little bit to do with the theme of that one—not the words but the direction," Mr. Smith said. "I'm done with 'sweating the details.' Now I want to move on to the 21st Century."

With a slight build, wire-rim glasses and high-pitched voice, Mr. Smith is an unlikely looking explorer.

Intellectually, however, he is as suited to this corporate-world quest as any pith-helmeted jungle explorer of a century ago. He is curious, eager to try new ideas, willing to abandon a position of comfort.

And like a practiced explorer of untraveled terrain, he weighs risks against potential gains, learns from his mistakes and hires experienced guides.

Since taking over as chairman on Jan. 1, 1981, Mr. Smith has steadily moved GM toward the global, technology-based, marketing-oriented shape he envisions. Along the way, he is changing the rules on how cars will be produced and sold by the entire industry.

Mr. Smith has reorganized GM's truck operations and car operations into two groups, emphasizing marketing as a guide to product development and allowing car division managers to go outside GM for vehicles.

In his first two years as chairman, he pared 27,000 white-collar and 172,000 blue-collar jobs to streamline the company. GM's Media Council, created in his third year as chairman, has scrutinized advertising agency relationships, ad efficiencies and effectiveness, as well as development of improved in-house marketing and advertising expertise.

Mr. Smith also has aggressively purchased high-technology companies such as Electronic Data Systems, Dallas, and Hughes Aircraft, El Segundo, Cal. These companies—specializing in computing, aerospace, machine-vision, financial services and tele-

Acquisitions & mercy missions top '85 events

From a year chock full of news, Advertising Age selected these 10 marketing-related events as the most newsworthy.

FORECAST & REVIEW

The year 1985 will likely be remembered as the year Wall Street moved into the corporate offices of some of the nation's largest companies and served notice that no public company, no matter how large, was safe from takeover.

More than $41.1 billion was spent on or committed to mergers and acquisitions of consumer-products companies, airlines and media companies. There was another $6 billion to $7 billion in takeovers that eventually were aborted, led by Ted Turner's unsuccessful $5.4 billion bid to acquire CBS.

Three megamergers—R.J. Reynolds Industries' $5.25 billion merger with Nabisco Brands, Philip Morris Cos.' $5.7 billion merger with General Foods Corp. and Procter & Gamble's $1.55 billion acquisition of Richardson-Vicks—saw the title of the nation's largest national advertiser change hands three times in three months. The combined RJR/Nabisco, with an estimated $1.01 billion in measured and unmeasured ad spending in 1984, eclipsed longtime leader P&G. PM/GF then checked in at $1.02 billion. But scarcely days later, P&G's marriage to R-V retook the title with an estimated $1.03 billion in spending.

The megamergers set executives at several agencies on edge with fears that so-called "soft" conflicts would lead to a major reshuffling of account responsibilities. Many observers believe that reshuffling will occur in 1986.

Here's a partial scorecard on who bought what, or who tried to buy what, during 1985:

FEBRUARY: Greyhound Corp. acquires the consumer-products division of Purex Industries for $264 million.

MARCH: Rupert Murdoch buys a half interest in 20th Century Fox Film Corp. for $162 million and an $88 million loan. . .Capital Cities Communications agrees to merge with American Broadcasting Co. in a $3.5 billion deal. . .Ted Turner launches his ill-fated $5.4 billion

Our 10 predictions for hot topics in '86

There will be plenty of surprises for all in 1986, but here are 10 areas where Advertising Age editors see news apoppin' next year.

Pfizer Inc.'s search for an agency to handle consumer-targeted prescription drug campaigns may be a sign of the times as the pharmaceutical industry maneuvers to get a handle on the government's newly relaxed attitude toward drug advertising.

The three drugs Pfizer wants to advertise directly to consumers include what many feel will be the advertising pioneers among prescription drugs: Medications for arthritis and heart diseases. Those ailments afflict a large number of consumers—large enough, perhaps, to justify the additional costs of consumer advertising.

Although some in government agencies, including senior staffers at the Federal Trade Commission and Food & Drug Administration, are pushing for more advertising on the theory that it will heighten competition and lower prices, the prevailing industry sentiment seems to be of the opposite view: More ads mean higher marketing costs and lower revenues.

The drugs Pfizer is most interested in bringing to the consumer ad stream include Procardia (heart), Feldene (arthritis) and Minipress (hypertension).

Merrell Dow is perhaps the most active in the direct-to-consumer business, first with a wide campaign for Nicoret, an anti-smoking aid, and then for Seldane, an antihistamine without the usual drowsiness side effects.

FDA deputy commissioner John Norris has said there are a number of drugs for which direct-to-consumer advertising would work well, another number for which its use would be questionable and a third group for which it would neither work nor be allowed.

But the FDA has not yet shed any clear light on which drugs fall into which of those three categories and, until it does, the prescription-drug marketers must tread lightly.

Some of the biggest automotive news in 1986 is likely to come in small packages—small cars from unlikely places such as Yugoslavia, Korea and Greece.

Yugo America, Montvale, N.J., fired the first shot in the entry-level car war with its August introduction of the $3,990 Yugo GV built in Yugoslavia by Zavodi Crvena Zastava.

Korea's Hyundai Corp., already the top import nameplate in Canada, plans to introduce its mid-$5,000 Excel subcompact in the U.S. Feb. 15.

FORECAST & REVIEW

Another Korean manufacturer, Daewoo Motors, will supply General Motors' Pontiac division with 75,000 minicars a year starting in the fall of 1986.

The Desta APV, an under-$5,000 utility vehicle assembled in Greece using mostly Ford of Europe components, will be introduced about mid-April by Automotive Imports & Marketing, Phoenix.

"With the average price of a new car now exceeding $11,300 and that of a used car at the $5,200 level, many Americans find themselves priced out of the marketplace for a new car," said William Prior, president of Yugo America, in describing the market niche sought by these new entries. Yugo launch advertising, via Rosenfeld, Sirowitz & Lawson, New York, positioned the car as heir to classics of practical transportation, the Model T and the Volkswagen Beetle.

Although it only brought in 8,000 cars for sale, mostly in the Northeast, in 1985, Yugo attracted considerable press attention, and claimed that virtually all its cars were presold by dealers.

Yugo plans to complete its national network of dealers by summer and is aiming at sales of 40,000 in its first full year, through Aug. 31, and then 75,000 cars in the second year.

Also introduced in late 1985 was the Samurai, from Japanese maker Suzuki. A sort of subcompact Jeep, the Samurai is being marketed as both a truck and—with backseat added—a car. Suzuki is bringing in about 10,000 between Nov. 1 and March 31.

Hyundai will offer three-door and five-door hatchbacks and four-door sedans in its drive to sell 100,000 units in the U.S. in 1986. Distribution will begin in 31 states.

Hills Bros. taps Riney

Hills Bros. is starting a new round of tv commercials, featuring actor Elliot Gould, for its Hills Bros. Gold Blend premium coffee. The ads were created by Riney & Associates, San Francisco, agency for Hills' sister company MJB Co. (AA, Oct. 7). The San Francisco-based coffee company, owned by Swiss-based Nestle SA, selected the Riney spots over the work of Hills Bros.' agency Cohen/Johnson, Los Angeles, in a creative competition, but Cohen/Johnson still is the agency of record. The product is rolling into Hills' western, midwestern and northeastern marketing territories after testing in Arizona and Wisconsin (AA, Oct. 24). It is Hills' first entry into the pre-flies the British Union Jack as its logo, was on a fast track in 1985. Selling 13 million pairs of shoes for sales of $275 million, it claims its aerobic and fitness-shoe unit market share reached 68%, comfortably outpacing competitors such as Nike, Foot Joy and New Balance. Now, during the coming year, it will jump into basketball shoes and sports clothes while trying to build its children's shoe and adult running-shoe businesses.

With origins dating back to 19th Century England, the company's shoes are worn by world-class runners such as Briton Steve Jones. Those tie-ins and Reebok's very British logo have prompted some retailers to promote the line under the theme "The British are coming." But 20th Century Reebok is a success story written in the colonies, not the mother country.

In 1979, Paul Fireman, an American marketer of outdoor equipment, obtained the license for Reebok in North America and by 1984 Reebok's U.S. shoe sales were $65 million. During that same year, Reebok moved its headquarters from England to Avon, Mass., and Mr. Fireman stepped up from licensee to president-ceo of Reebok

Jumping into U.S. market

International. In mid-'85, Mr. Fireman's original U.S. distributorship merged with Reebok International to become Reebok International Ltd., and went public in the U.S.

With most manufacturing now done in Korea rather than England and with a $6.5 million advertising and promotion budget handled by Maslow, Gold & Rothschild, Boston, Reebok International Ltd. makes no pretense that its British connection today is anything other than symbolic.

But it's an association that serves both Reebok and the British. One source at the British Trade Development authority in New York says British products are perceived as quality products in the U.S. Stressing that cachet and its belief that the U.S. market is a favorable one for British marketers because of exchange rates, the BTD has been encouraging its manufacturers to sell and promote more in the U.S.

This year they have. Food From Britain USA began an extended ad campaign this fall in Boston, via Warwick Advertising, and encouraged separate campaigns in other cities to dispel the notion that British food is bad. For 1985, British food imports to the U.S. were up 30% compared with last year. British manufacturers also got a boost this year from J.C. Penney Co. when that chain bought $50 million worth of British-made clothing for a storewide salute to Britain, which the Prince and Princess of Wales attended. And the U.K.'s Double Diamond Original Burton Ale also tried to tap the U.S. imported-beer market with a foray into the Northeast.

Even British auto makers are getting into the act. Since 1981, Jaguar has been the only British auto marketer in the U.S. The luxury marketer since 1980 has enjoyed more than a 500% sales increase and will have moved 20,000 cars, priced at more than $32,000 each, by the end of this year. Now, Austin Rover is poised to come back into the market by late 1986 or early 1987 in a joint venture with Honda.

In the fast-food industry, 1985 was the year of the "big burger," but of the menu marvels tried the most successful was McDonald's McD.L.T. sandwich.

The news in 1984 had been the rise of the so-called "gourmet burger" restaurants, where those same consumers who were telling pollsters they were interested in more "healthy" foods such as sprouts and mineral water were lining up to buy half-pound burgers topped with every condiment known to foodservice. Fast-food chains responded by trying to develop even bigger and gloppier burgers than they had already.

On the West Coast, the Carl's Jr. chain rolled out the ⅓-lb. Western Bacon Cheeseburger. Roast-beef maker Arby's tested a ⅓-lb. burger, too. Marriott's Roy Rogers chain trotted out the Double-R-Bar Burger topped with smoked ham and cheese. In Milwaukee and Indianapolis, McDonald's tried the ⅓-lb. Cheddar Melt burger, topped with cheese and grilled onions.

The most noise was made by Burger King, which had the fast-food "coup" of the year when it increased the size of its Whopper—the original lettuce and tomato hamburger—from 3.6 ozs. to 4.2 ozs., thereby making it larger than any competitor's ¼-lb. burger. Burger King spent $30 million in eight weeks to announce the change and the results were awesome: Customers yawned and the chain's advertising-awareness score dropped. Former senior vp-marketing Don Dempsey is now over in the operations department.

Only Wendy's, which had made a name for itself years ago by selling only big burgers that it always has admitted are messy (remember the "Hot 'n' juicy" and "Lots of napkins" campaigns?), sat out the hunt for the bigger burger. Instead, it added baked potatoes, chicken sandwiches and breakfast.

The idea of a lettuce-and-tomato-topped burger has been kicking around the McDonald's system for years. Such a sandwich was tested under the McFeast name off and on for years. Late in 1984 it resurfaced as the Lettuce & Tomato Special in Shreveport, La.

Barely a year later, McDonald's had the sandwich—rechristened the McD.L.T.—moved into all 6,800 U.S. stores, which probably means that Americans will spend more on McD.L.T.s in 1986 than they will in all the "gourmet burger" restaurants combined. So much for competitive threats to Big Mac.

If nothing else, the McD.L.T. represents some of the best news America's farmers got all year. McDonald's will use 800,000 tomatoes and 100,000 heads of lettuce daily preparing the sandwiches. Onion and pickle producers no doubt are dancing in the fields as well.

There's nothing terribly innovative about the product itself. It's basically the Quarter Pounder hamburger McDonald's has sold since 1972 (but for which sales have slowed lately) topped with tomatoes, lettuce, mustard, ketchup, mayonnaise, onions, pickles and cheese. As a press release from Needham Harper Worldwide's Phoenix office (where it handles the local co-op) points out gleefully, "That's more flavor than you'll find on any other sandwich in the quick-service restaurant industry!" Anything for an edge.

The hot and cold of it

What separates the McD.L.T. from the Whopper, the Wendy's Single and the rest is its packaging. The twin-bay foam container in which the McD.L.T. is served was the brainchild of franchisee Will May in Nacogdoches, Tex. Burger and bun bottom are in one half, bun top and condiments in the other. The result, as initial advertising for the product stressed, is that "The hot stays hot and the cool stays cool," thereby answering the question, "Why, if we can put a man on the moon, can't someone serve a burger with lettuce and tomato that can stand up to a heat lamp?"

McDonald's has a tradition of good ideas from its franchisees. Jim Delegatti in Pittsburgh developed the Big Mac; Lou Groen in Cincinnati came up with the Filet-O-Fish, and Santa Barbara's Art Bender invented the Egg McMuffin. Will May says he explained his idea for the McD.L.T. package to McDonald's chairman Fred Turner by laying two square glass ashtrays end to end. Glass being too expensive, McDonald's went with foam.

McDonald's didn't waste time moving the McD.L.T. to national availability, and it didn't cut corners on the marketing side. The chain quickly signed Chicago Bears' 308-lb. rookie and cult hero William (The Refrigerator) Perry, shot a commercial and got it on the air during the Dec. 2 network matchup of the Bears and Miami Dolphins. That broadcast garnered higher ratings for that week than all but two other programs, edging even "Miami Vice."

Some companies just live right.

Syndicated tv reruns became the entertainment industry's biggest business with revenues from tv production outpacing theatrical films.

- Sales of MCA/Universal's "Magnum, P.I." reached $1.7 million per episode, a record price for an off-network hour syndicated show. Twentieth Century Fox's "The Fall Guy," with Lee Majors, sold for $1.1 million per episode.
- "Silver Spoons," a marginally rated half-hour comedy available for airing in 1987, presold in 27 markets for $70 million. If brisk sales continue, the NBC series could earn its producers an unheard of $1.5 million per episode for 116 shows.
- "The Honeymooners," the 1950s Jackie Gleason b&w half-hour comedy, made headlines when Viacom unearthed 52 new episodes thought to be lost. The comedy classics ran on the premium cable service Showtime. The shows became the focus of the pay channel's marketing campaign.
- Christian Broadcasting Network paid $1 million for the rights to Orion TV's sitcom "Green Acres."

Other shows of yesteryear, such as "Perry Mason," "Leave It to Beaver," "Wagon Train" and "The Rifleman" are finding new life on cable tv, consistently rating among the top 10 cablecast shows.

The nostalgia wave even reached commercials. Frito-Lay interspersed a spokesman with clips from "Mr. Ed," "Leave It to Beaver" and "Dragnet" to help sell its Tostitos brand. The clever $9.1 million campaign earned the 1985 Clio Award for confections/-snacks.

But this all isn't just a warm look back at tv's golden years. Sid Caesar stands to make a fortune syndicating 65 half hours of comedy culled from his legendary "Your Show of Shows" and "Caesar's Hour" for fall, 1986.

Others will follow the path to syndication riches in the near future. But while most think syndication will remain a lucrative business for years to come, it seems likely that the industry will not sustain the heady record-driven sales pace. The number of new cable channels and independent tv stations aren't expected to grow as quickly as in recent years.

This should lead to a more stable future market with prices leveling off for reruns, but until then the owners of tv series are smiling. Especially those responsible for "The Bill Cosby Show."

If shows such as "Webster" and "Silver Spoons" can sell for more than $1 million per episode in 1985, they figure "Cosby" could go for as much as $2.5 million per episode and be the big story next year.

Pump-dispensed toothpastes once were the new twist in an old category, but by yearend the new plaque and tartar-fighting dentifrices were the hot topic of conversation among dentists and consumers.

The reason for such high awareness is that Procter & Gamble and Colgate-Palmolive have spent more than $10 million apiece in the last half of the year, promoting new Crest Tartar Control Formula and new Dentagard plaque-remover toothpaste, respectively.

For 1986, industry observers expect $35 million-to-$50 million advertising and promotional budgets as Beecham Products, Lever Bros.

Dentifrices
Fighting tartar, plaque and Johnson & Johnson join the plaque-and-tartar party with "adult" toothpastes of their own.

Yet some industry analysts criticize P&G's and Colgate's advertising efforts, saying consumers are confused about what is the difference between the two gum-disease-related problems.

"Ask most anyone what's the difference between the two and they say it's all the same," said a toothpaste product manager.

However, analysts caution that it is too early to draw conclusions about either company's marketing efforts.

And, although Colgate beat P&G to the starting gate by introducing Dentagard in April while P&G waited until June to roll Crest Tartar Control Formula out of test market, the Cincinnati-based household-products giant once again has firm control of the toothpaste category.

P&G recently posted a strong 35%-to-37% total Crest market share, up from a midyear 30.5% share—due primarily to its new Crest Tartar Control. The introduction of the Crest pump has not started showing up in market-share data.

During the same period, Colgate rang up a total 28% share, down about half a share point, while its Colgate brand alone pulled a 23% share, down five points from its spring peak of 28%. At that time, many analysts believed Colgate would overtake P&G as the market leader, but not anymore.

"P&G has done an effective job with marketing Crest Tartar Control Formula, while Colgate hasn't convinced consumers there's a difference between it and Dentagard," said Jay Freedman, household-products analyst, Kidder, Peabody, New York.

Adds Hugh Zurkuhlen, P&G watcher at Salomon Bros., New York, "What surprised me was how much P&G's share picked up with the introduction of Tartar Control—and it doesn't include the pump. It's now a two-toothpaste race between Colgate and P&G."

Mr. Zurkuhlen said Beecham's Aqua-fresh and Lever's Aim continue losing market share to both Colgate and P&G, although no figures were available.

At the same time, Chaska, Minn.-based Minnetonka, the company that was first in the plaque and pump-dispensed toothpaste category with Check-Up, successfully defended its market position through the initial onslaught by P&G and Colgate.

Check-Up has an estimated 4.5% share, a position that has not changed substantially since the introduction of the new Crest formula nor Colgate's Dentagard.

Minnetonka, through agency Bozell & Jacobs, Minneapolis, ran print ads in major consumer magazines and periodically dropped coupons in Sunday newspaper freestanding inserts.

Additionally, Warner-Lambert's Listerine was repositioned as a weapon in the fight against plaque.

While both P&G's and Colgate's toothpastes have received the seal of approval from the American Dental Assn.'s Council on Dental Therapeutics, the seal was granted because the toothpastes fight cavities, not because they reduce plaque or tartar.

The Chicago-based ADA is expected to unveil its plaque guidelines by early 1986, although industry observers say the guidelines already are "too late to make much difference" in the way plaque fighters are marketed.

Dishonorable mention

One of the hottest products of 1985, as it has been for several years, is illegal and often debilitating to users: Cocaine.

According to statistics from the National Institute on Drug Abuse, cocaine abuse shows no sign of declining. Mentions of cocaine as a contributing factor in cases handled by U.S. hospital emergency rooms were up again last year—a projected 12%, based on actual numbers for the first half.

More ominously, use by teen agers continues to grow rapidly. Last year, 6.7% of high school seniors surveyed by NIDA admitted using cocaine in the previous month, up from 5.8% in 1984 and 4.9% in 1983.

Cocaine abuse has spread to the workplace, reaching epidemic levels in some fields, drug experts say. Cocaine's effect on the lives and work of people in advertising was explored in a two-part Advertising Age series (AA, Sept. 23, et seq.).#

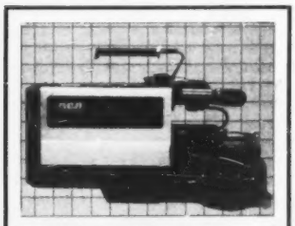
full-size VHS models by several makers, camcorders should supplant two-piece models as the portable video system of choice. Camcorders are now available in four basic formats: VHS, VHS-C (a compact VHS format), Beta and 8mm.



Camcorders
Upgrading the vcr market

RCA, General Electric, Magnavox, Panasonic and several other electronics companies will have full-size VHS models on the market early this year. Before introduction of the standard VHS format, consumers with VHS vcrs at home were forced to use the compact format, whose tapes are only 20 minutes long. VHS deck owners now can purchase the standard format camcorders that play tapes up to two hours in length.

With more than 20 million VHS vcrs in use and total vcr penetration approaching 30%, industry observers expect a camcorder boom this year. Most camcorder purchasers, it is expected, will select a unit that is compatible with their home vcrs.

FORECAST & REVIEW

The biggest drawback to camcorder sales will be their price. Most models retail for more than $1,500, causing many retailers to believe consumers are awaiting the rapid drop in price that is now common about a year after new technology hits the market.

The ultra-compact 8mm format, whose tapes are about the size of an audiocassette, is expected to receive its greatest acceptance among consumers who don't own vcrs. Those consumers will be able to purchase 8mm decks for playback. Only three companies—Kodak, Canon and Sony—had 8mm decks on the market in the fourth quarter, but several others are expected to join the fray early this year.

The 8mm format, decks and all, will really take off once videocassette marketers see it as a viable option that is here to stay—unlike Beta—and begin to produce 8mm software for playback.

General Electric and Polaroid marketed 8mm camcorders in 1985, though neither company had a home deck on the market. Camcorders in the 8mm format are priced about the same as VHS and Beta units, but because there is so little competition in the 8mm vcr category, those units are priced very high. While a mid-line VHS or Beta deck can be had for $400 or less, 8mm decks were retailing for $1,500 or more in '85.

Nonetheless, a spokesman for Sony said fourth-quarter demand for 8mm was so strong, the company was "flying 747 jumbo jets of them in from Japan."

The stand-alone 15-second commercial, one of the most significant developments in commercial tv in 10 years, got off to a running start in 1985. In 1986, the revolution will be well under way.

Like most revolutions, the solo 15 will have its detractors and supporters. But one fact remains certain: The unit will come into widespread use before the year is out.

This was the year the 15-second ad worked its way into mainstream use and advertiser consciousness. A Television Bureau of Advertising survey shows that an average of 5,500 15s were run weekly from January to September.

That pace marked a 228% increase from 1984. While TvB did not project use into this year, some industry experts have estimated that use will double, if not triple, by yearend.

The move to 15s has some far-reaching ramifications, both for advertisers and the tv industry. Increased clutter is the most immediate one; all agree this could lead to a deterioration in tv's effectiveness.

Clutter aside, there's an irresistible lure to the 15. The networks see a way of building their revenue base by attracting marketers who have been shut out from the high-price world of network tv; so far, 15s sell for half the cost of a 30.

This would have the effect of drawing some advertisers away from magazines, cable and, most important, syndication. Only CBS-TV sells solo 15s throughout its commercial schedule. ABC-TV sells 15s in lieu of 10s on news, sports and business briefs.

NBC-TV remains resolute in its stand against 15s, a stand that is expected to be modified once the network begins losing business to its rivals.

Marketers have been ambivalent. Major package-goods companies see it as an excellent tool to build frequency for brands, especially those hurt by rising costs in tv. Unfortunately, the 15 allows smaller competitors into their formerly exclusive domain.

There's a big creative issue as well. Directors, comfortable in the 30-second world, are loath to break new campaigns in the 15-second mold. But this could change as well.

Sophisticated users are exploring ways of kicking off campaigns via 15-second spots.

The solo 15 has set off a chain reaction in network tv that will gain momentum in the coming months. No longer content to think about tv in terms of 30s or 60s or even 15s only, some advertisers want a medium unfettered by any prescribed lengths. Clorox Co. has asked the networks to sell solo 20s. ABC is thinking of selling advertisers 60-second pods, to be divided any way the advertiser wants.

Could 1986 be the year tv ends up looking like the back pages of some magazines?#

Ford makes music with compact player

By CLEVELAND HORTON

Ford Motor Co. will become the first U.S. auto maker to include a compact-disc player as a factory option next spring as part of a 140-watt audio system for its high-end 1986 Lincoln Continentals and Town Cars.

Japan's Mazda Motor Corp. also is expected to introduce a compact-disc player in the U.S. next spring for its top-of-the line RX7 GXL model.

Ford's audio system, which features 12 speakers, was designed in conjunction with loudspeaker marketer JBL Inc., Northridge, Cal. Print and radio ads are themed "The concert continues with the Ford/JBL system," which was introduced in October. Wells, Rich, Greene, Detroit, is agency for the Lincoln-Mercury division.

Don Duncan, planning, marketing and sales manager for Ford's audio products group, said Ford expects 20% to 30% of Town Car and Continental sales will include the optional audio system.

The audio system adds just over $500 to the cost of the music option. Although the company hasn't set a price on the compact-disc player, it is expected to be in the $600-to-$800 range.

Only 3% of Lincoln-Mercury division customers settle for a factory-installed radio, opting instead for a stereo system.

Earlier this year in Japan, Mazda added a compact-disc player as an option for its Familia model, which is sold as the 323 in the U.S. The factory-installed cd player for its RX7 GXL will be built by Pioneer Electronics. Foote, Cone & Belding is Mazda's agency.#

Apple won't bite into Super Bowl ads

By CLEVELAND HORTON

Apple Computer's decision not to participate in the upcoming telecast of Super Bowl XX is either an indication of the personal computer marketer's maturity or a sign that its long-term vision went out the door with founder Steven Jobs.

The company, whose bold tv commercials dominated the last two Super Bowls, doesn't plan to sit on the marketing sidelines entirely, however. It's planning a media event in mid-January with a conference called AppleWorld in San Francisco.

There, Apple executives will present the Cupertino, Cal.-based company's goals to industry analysts and the press.

Apple changed its course after a difficult corporate reorganization this year. While Mr. Jobs vowed to put "a Macintosh computer on every desk," current president-ceo John Sculley has a different vision: He's inclined to find appropriate desktops and market selectively to the people sitting behind them.

A former Apple marketing manager applauded the company's decision to cut its advertising excesses. "They've proven they can waste more money than anyone else," he said. "They have to concentrate now on market development, not just awareness."

Apple defends its decision to pass on tv's most expensive time.

"During the last two Januarys, Apple had something fairly dramatic to say," said Bruce Mowery, advertising and sales promotion manager. "This year, we don't feel we have a strong enough message."

However, Apple is widely rumored to be planning two significant January product introductions: A more powerful Apple II and a faster Macintosh that will enable those lines to share software and peripherals.

Undoubtedly, the high cost of Super Bowl tv time played a large part in Apple's decision to shun the big game. Although the company projected it would end its first fiscal quarter with record earnings, it earned those profits on reduced sales, compared with the previous year. Mr. Sculley has said he wants the company to become more profitable in 1986 on flat sales.

Apple Computer scored a grandstanding touchdown during Super Bowl XVIII with its breakthrough announcement of the Macintosh computer with the eerie "1984" spot. While the commercial ran only once, its impact was magnified by countless news stories.

Apple's controversial "Lemmings" spot the following year did not gain the critical success of its predecessor but drew much attention from the press and public.

Some think Apple is missing an opportunity by staying out of Super Bowl XX. Bill Kelley, vp-management supervisor, Keye/-Donna/Pearlstein, Los Angeles, said, "If they had stayed in the Super Bowl, it would have been an opportunity to make up for the missed communication last year."

Greg Helm, director of client services at Chiat/Day, Los Angeles, Apple's agency, though, said, "I don't know that 110 million Americans are expecting an ad from Apple." He insisted that Apple's media strategy would be noted only within the advertising and personal computer industries.

Apple marketing head Michael Lorelli dismissed the possibility of a backlash to the decision to abandon the Super Bowl. "In the business arena, our marketing efforts are more selective, both in the present and the future."

Apple posted its first quarterly loss in the third fiscal quarter last year, largely attributed to its reorganization. The company released its projections for the first fiscal quarter earlier this month, stating it will post about $52 million in earnings, its most profitable quarter ever.#

There were three SAMI refrigerated food categories with an increase in dollars exceeding $100 million: Orange juice (up $131.3 million), warehoused yogurt (up $131 million) and lunch meat (up $102.4 million).

Health & beauty aids

Much of the action in health & beauty aids categories represented a holdover from trends detected in 1984, particularly increases for hair-setting needs (primarily hair-styling mousse products), eye-care products, sleeping aids and stick deodorant/antiperspirants.

Other h&ba categories with annual food-store retail sales increases of more than $25 million included internal analgesics, where new products such as American Home Products' Advil, Bristol-Myers' Nuprin and Procter & Gamble's Encaprin added year-to-year volume.

New pump dentifrices and plaque-tartar formulations can be credited with some of the $64 million increase in toothpaste sales.#

HMOs reach for mainstream status

Regional plans boost ad buys to gain edge

By JULIE FRANZ

Health Maintenance Organizations have become one of the fastest-growing categories of regional marketers.

This year, these health plans shed their image as alternative providers to become part of the mainstream in the eyes of both employes and employers. In 1986, they are expected to continue their rapid growth, boosting ad buys in some of the nation's most lucrative markets.

The New York market should outpace the rest of the nation because several Jewish-sponsored hospitals there have formed a pre-paid health plan, said Randall Huyser, health industry analyst, Montgomery Securities, San Francisco. Heavy competition is expected to continue in California, particularly the Los Angeles and San Francisco markets.

This year, HMOs spent an estimated $100 million on advertising, up 50% from last year, according to industry sources.

During the same period, HMO membership rose 25% to 8.9 million, as these health plans entered new markets.

The abundance of opportunity in the field lured 92 new programs into the fray, bringing the total number of prepaid health plans in the U.S. to 383.

Membership and ad spending will continue to snowball as independent and national, publicly traded HMO networks begin to hook up secondary markets.

"HMOs are starting to get the credibility they need to grow because people are happy with the care they are receiving and employers are happy with the money they're saving," said David Hallis, senior vp-marketing for MaxiCare Health Plans, Hawthorne, Cal., one of the category's top five networks.

HMO enrollments

Source: Randall Huyser, a health industry analyst in Montgomery Securities, San Francisco.

State	1984	1985
California	5,300,000	5,900,000
Michigan	645,000	904,000
Wisconsin	577,000	845,000
Illinois	629,000	815,000
Ohio	501,000	719,000
Florida	401,000	641,000

In more established markets, the question has become not whether to sign up with an HMO but which HMO to use.

Major West Coast aerospace companies require new employes to sign up for HMO coverage and sources say workers at General Motors Saturn plant will be offered only HMO coverage.

What makes the health plans attractive is the medical care offered at a set rate, without deductibles or co-payments.

Families with children and the elderly generally realize the highest savings.

Next year, most HMOs will spend their advertising dollars to dispel the impression that medical coverage under these plans is restrictive and substandard.

"You're not giving up anything; you do have a choice of providers," is a message expected to be used by many, said Mr. Hallis.

In Southern California, MaxiCare just completed an eight-week tv and radio campaign addresing that problem.

The tv spots featured closeups of six doctors leaning into the camera, advising, "Say ah." Chiat/Day, Los Angeles, is MaxiCare's agency.

The introduction of Preferred Provider Organizations—or PPOs—also is expected to spur growth in the field.

Unlike HMOs, PPOs require a lower fee from employers, but often charge employes co-payments and deductibles for care. PPOs also pay for a portion of care given by physicians or hospitals not under contract.

HMOs will begin offering PPOs as an incremental product in an attempt to gain access to larger segments of the population, Mr. Huyser said.

Industry analysts agree traditional insurance companies are in the best position to take advantage of additional coverage plans. Then they can advertise traditional insurance, HMO and PPO coverage in an effort to be all things to all people.

"The field is relatively new, and we want to make people realize that it's a value—in cost and in its delivery system. It also removes many of the obstacles traditionally standing [in the way of a] member's good health care," said Mr. Hallis.#

Preferred Care's ads promote the cost efficiency of a Health Maintenance Organization. Ads stress $3 doctor appointments, periodic physical exams and immunizations. Preferred Care is the largest Rochester-area HMO, with 85,000 members—a 27% increase over last year. Hutchins/Young & Rubicam created the $270,000 campaign, themed "Handle with care."

Plans boost ad budgets

By JUDITH A. BILTEKOFF

An unusually high percentage of enrollees has Rochester, N.Y., Health Maintenance Organizations dividing to conquer.

Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Rochester is offering two separately designed and promoted programs to a market where 30% to 35% of those under 65 already belong to an HMO. That number is expected to grow to 43% in 1986; the industry average is 13% to 15%.

Blue Cross' two programs—Blue Choice and Genesee Valley Group Health Assn.—combined have 102,000 members. The programs differ slightly—but both tout BC/BS affiliation.

With three area centers, Genesee boosted its ad budget 57% this year to $220,000—but saw only a 13% enrollee increase. Genesee has 43,000 members.

Blue Choice, which affiliates with individual practices, outdistanced Genesee by pulling in 50,000 members on Jan. 1, its first day of operation. Membership is expected to increase markedly next year when Blue Choice opens an "over-65 facility," said Bob Vogel, executive director.

The company would not comment on its advertising budget, but said it plans to continue to heavily advertise Blue Choice. Blue Choice competes with two agressive marketers: Rochester Health Network and Preferred Care.

Preferred Care is the largest Rochester-area HMO, with 85,000 members, a 27% increase from last year. This year, it spent $270,000 on its "Handle with Preferred Care" campaign. Hutchins/Young & Rubicam, Rochester, handles.

Rochester Health Network is the biggest advertiser in the market, spending $300,000 to promote itself as the "Network that cares about you." Broadcast is handled by Flynn Associates; DeFranco Associates is the agency for print.#

Boston HMOs switch strategy to competition

By ALAN RADDING

Health Maintenance Organization advertising in Massachusetts will shift from an informational to competitive approach in 1986.

Until recently, HMOs informally agreed on educating the public on the health plans, said Jennifer Neville, account exec, Altaman & Manley, a Cambridge, Mass.-based ad agency handling Multigroup Health Plan.

With a combined 16% market share, the top HMOs—Harvard Community Health Plan, Bay State Health Care and Multigroup—are boosting ad spending to create name recognition. The three spent $3 million to $4 million in advertising in 1985, up about 10% from 1984, industry observers estimate.

Total HMO advertising may run about $6 million in 1986, they conclude.

HCHP, which had the HMO market virtually to itself until the late 1970s, leads the pack with more than 200,000 subscribers, up about 15% in the past year. BSHC is the second largest HMO in the market with 130,000 subscribers, followed by Multigroup with 65,000 subscribers.

Only recently have the plans begun to take competitive swipes at each other.

BSHC just completed an aggressive radio campaign positioning it as "the doctor's plan" as opposed to the other health plans it says are "run by accountants." Clarke Goward Fitts, Boston, former agency for HCHP, now handles BSHC.

Although some observers see BSHC's advertising as being aimed at HCHP, account exec Christina Lamb disagrees, "We always position against the market leader," which is Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Massachusetts, Boston, a traditional health insurance plan.

Multigroup calls itself "the best" in five radio and tv spots. The HMO anticipates healthy growth at the expense of traditional health insurers. "Traditional insurance plans are quickly becoming a thing of the past," said Ms. Neville.

But insurance companies are responding to the plans by coming up with their own HMOs or creating traditional coverage plans that resemble HMOs.

For example, Blue Cross, which has a 55% share of the health-coverage market, has set up its own staff model HMO, Medical East, in the Boston market. For people who still want traditional health insurance, BC/BS has developed Master Health Plan, a program which eliminates much of the paperwork associated with conventional health insurance.

Hospitals in the area are attempting to cooperate with the HMOs instead of fighting them.

For instance, Brigham & Women's hospital has set up a special relationship with HCHP to handle all its major hospitalization.

The statewide hospital association also is gearing up a low-key media campaign informing the public about the role of the hospitals in the community.

Smaller hospitals, such as Central Hospital in Sommerville, are scrambling to fill special niches, such as alcohol-abuse treatment.#

Sears will boost magazine budget

By LAURIE FREEMAN

Sears, Roebuck & Co. plans to spend more on magazine advertising this year and to sharpen its tv focus as it fine-tunes its "Store of the future" strategy.

The strategy's emphasis on individual products, especially those introduced under its "New century" program (AA, Dec. 2), is part of the retailer's plan to stress product innovation during this 100th anniversary year.

"When we began the 'Store of the future' program two years ago, we wanted to show how the physical environment of the stores had changed, and we put a heavy emphasis on tv during that period. Now, we'll be using more magazine ads than we did a couple of years ago, which allows us to be more product-oriented and to target specific audiences," a Sears spokeswoman said.

Chicago offices of Ogilvy & Mather and Needham Harper Worldwide share Sears' $726.2 million merchandise division ad budget. O&M handles appliances, automotive and hard lines; Needham is the 'Letterman' powers late-night rampage

By VERNE GAY

NEW YORK—NBC-TV's "Late Night with David Letterman" suddenly has become the hottest property in the hottest daypart in network tv: Late night.

For the second consecutive year "Letterman" has sold out commercial avails in the first quarter, a remarkable accomplishment since the show is in "late" late night, starting an hour after most of its competitors. Only "Saturday Night Live" also is sold out in late night for the first quarter, and "SNL" is a weekend show when there is a larger late-night audience available.

CBS-TV also is reporting high sell-out levels in the daypart. ABC-TV, which features "Nightline" and "Eye on Hollywood," is considered a "news buy" for most advertisers, and thus has not been part of the recent surge in late-night ad spending. ABC however, plans to add a new program to follow "Nightline" this fall. The nature of the show is still under discussion.

The heavy marketplace action in late night is unusual. In most markets late-night sales follow daytime and prime time: After advertisers have satisfied their appetites on inventory in these higher-price dayparts, they turn to late night to lower the cost-per-thousands on their over-all network packages. Late-night cpms normally are about 35% cheaper than comparable demographics in prime time. From an audience-profile perspective, late night has a heavier concentration of adults than any other daypart.

Two phenomena appear to have gripped the market recently. Some advertisers released from their commitments to Paramount Television's recently canceled "America" have channeled funds into late night, a daypart with prices comparable to "America." CBS re-

Marketers played 1985's fourth quarter like the rest of the year: Close to the vest, backing established brands at the expense of new-product launches, according to a survey of some major agencies.

Expectations for the new year from these shops range from predictions of no growth to cautious optimism.

Said Larry Wassong, president of William Esty Co., New York: "As a generalization, it appears that the majority of people were concentrating on their core businesses. They were not less interested in new products, but they put greater value on established brands and on heartland names, and on refreshing, updating and supporting them."

The general view predominating among marketers, according to Jerry Siano, vice-chairman of N W Ayer, New York, was, "Let's not cut badly, but let's not go overboard to launch new products or do much investment spending."

Is there "a distinct trend toward reinvesting in very strong brands? There's no doubt about that," said Graham Phillips, chairman of Ogilvy & Mather U.S.

There does not yet appear to be any documentation of this greater emphasis on established brands, however. Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York, which looks at new-product activity through its "New Product Newsletter," has projected that new package-goods product introductions would be up 11% for '85, but it includes line extensions and new flavors and varieties in its count of new products.

Supplements marketed to women

By PATRICIA WINTERS

NEW YORK—The woman in the tv commercial looks like a healthy 30-year-old—that is, until she begins to age. Within 30 seconds she is 65 years old, wrinkled, gray-haired and stooped over.

"Do something about calcium deficiency before your body does," the announcer says.

The commercial is part of a multi-million-dollar campaign for Marion Laboratories' market-leading Os-Cal calcium supplement. That, and other ads like it, are turning a once-sleepy calcium-supplement industry into a marketing battleground.

The battleground, which also involves charges of questionable product claims, is over a market that has mushroomed from $18 million in retail sales just six years ago to $125 million today. Sources believe it will reach $200 million by 1988.

The industry's advertising has expanded from medical journals to tv and major magazines, such as Good Housekeeping, Reader's Digest and Vogue.

Kansas City, Mo.-based Marion Labs' spending for Os-Cal, via Tracy-Locke, Dallas, has increased "dramatically" from pre-1984 levels, said Charles Rouse, manager-public affairs at Marion.

"Everyone is jumping into the market because they can see a market is there," he said. "Because of the increased awareness in the media and by manufacturers to take calcium now in order to prevent something later, the market is expanding dramatically."

The calcium-supplement market has been skyrocketing ever since studies began linking calcium deficiency with osteoporosis, a condition of weak or brittle bones that generally afflicts women in middle age.

Marketers are pitching calcium supplements at the baby-boomer generation of women, now in their 30s, encouraging them to think about preventing osteoporosis.

The condition afflicts an estimated 18 million to 20 million women, and an additional 35 million are at risk, Mr. Rouse said.

Over the past two years a plethora of companies has jumped into the market, including American Cyanamid's Lederle Laboratories, Wayne, N.J.; Warner-Lambert, Morris Plains; Miles Laboratories,

Marketing to the Soviets 38, 39
Since Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev came to power last year, a series of developments have indicated that Russia might be opening its doors to the West. These include media mogul Ted Turner's planned "Goodwill Games" this summer in Moscow as well as tv programing deals with CBS Worldwide and PBS. On the other end of the spectrum, a new Soviet auto will be launched this year in Europe and Canada. In a special report on the Soviet Union, Advertising Age examines these developments and what they mean for U.S. marketers and advertising agencies.

INTV: Indies 'Coming of Age'

By JAMES P. FORKAN

Los Angeles—Independent tv station executives opened the 13th annual Assn. of Independent Television Stations convention-seminar here this week with the steam going out of barter profit margins and other problems nipping at their heels.

The theme of the Jan. 5 to 9 convention at the Century Plaza is "Coming of Age," and a new INTV report indicates the independent tv business has done just that.

Independents, which numbered 190 stations in 1985, up from nearly 180 in 1984, garner $2.5 billion a year from advertisers, a sum that could hit $5 billion by 1990, according to the report.

Pizza Inn racing for family diners

By JENNIFER LAWRENCE

DALLAS—Pizza Inn, the nation's fourth-largest pizza chain, begins a new ad campaign today aimed at driving up dinner business by focusing on the fun of sharing a pizza. Tv spots feature a family rooting on one of their own at a high-performance go-cart race.

With entirely new theme, music and tag line, the campaign is backed by 50% more ad dollars than last year's $5 million-to-$6 million effort; the increase is going into tv. Pizza Inn's account is handled by Marschalk Co., Houston, which won the business from Stern/Monroe, Dallas, last June.

In addition to the ad budget increase, the company plans a 25%-to-40% decrease in discount couponing, said Roger Goertz, Pizza Inn vp. He said more emphasis is being placed on product quality than price in the pizza category, and Pizza Inn's ad campaign reflects this trend.

The chain, which operates 732 units in 28 states and seven foreign countries, reported total revenues of $148.3 million through the first nine months of 1985, compared to $135.5 million for the corresponding period in 1984.

Despite the sales gain, earnings dropped 80% during the same period, said Michael Smith, group vp at B.C. Christopher, a Kansas City-based regional brokerage company.

"I would think that Pizza Inn wants to increase traffic without giving the product away," Mr. Smith said. "The company will establish momentum with a new ad campaign, and the goal of increasing evening business would be a relatively easy one with a reasonably good chance of success."

Dailies join to back ABC after defections

By GARY LEVIN

SCHAUMBURG, ILL.—More than 50 newspaper publishers last week issued a strong vote of confidence in the Audit Bureau of Circulations here following earlier resignations from the organization by 15 other dailies (AA, Nov. 18, et seq.).

The move pitted publishers of the nation's most influential dailies, including the New York Times and Washington Post, against Gannett Co. and 14 of its papers that quit over what it called "outdated" methods of newspaper readership measurement.

In a brief statement released Jan. 3 and drafted by New York Times publisher Arthur Ochs Sulzberger, major dailies and media companies affirmed their commitment to ABC and its function as the arbiter of newspaper and magazine circulation measurement.

"We support the Audit Bureau of Circulations and intend to remain members," said the statement. "Although we may disagree with some of the ABC rules, it is our intention to work toward resolving these problems within the established framework. It is our firm conviction that publishers and advertisers need a strong, independent guarantee of standardized circulation data."

Washington Post publisher Donald Graham, spokesman for the ad hoc alliance, said signers of the statement include officials from the Baltimore Sun, Boston Globe, Chicago Tribune, Dallas Morning News, Houston Chronicle, New York Daily News, St. Louis Post-Dispatch and the Wall Street Journal, in addition to the New York Times and Washington Post. Companywide support from Capital Cities Communications, New York; Cox Newspapers, Atlanta; Donrey Media Group, Fort Smith, Ark.; Freedom Newspapers, Santa Ana, Cal.; Scripps-Howard, Cincinnati; Tribune Co., Chicago, and others also was expressed.

Times Mirror Co., Los Angeles, issued a separate but similar statement on behalf of its Dallas Times Herald, Denver Post, Los Angeles Times and Long Island (N.Y.) Newsday. On a somewhat more negative note, it cautioned, "ABC needs to be more receptive and flexible to innovation in the marketing of newspapers."

Central issues in the ABC dispute include the counting as paid circulation of bulk newspaper sales to air-

ADWATCH

Shoppers remember three 'c's in survey

By JULIE FRANZ

Computers, cameras and Carringtons were at the top of American shoppers' minds as they entered the holiday buying season, according to November adWatch data.

Advertising awareness scores for 12 different products gained or lost more than the 2.8 percentage points considered statistically significant. That's the largest number of products to shift ad recall in 1985, as recorded by ADVERTISING AGE's adWatch survey, which asks consumers to name the first advertising that comes to mind in various categories of any seen, heard or read in the past 30 days.

Apple Computer's share increased 5.4 percentage points to 30.5% of first mentions in November. That kept it on top of the computer category after losing 3.8 points the previous month. Apple's score was buoyed by 1.9% of respondents specifically recalling advertising for the Apple IIe and 1.1% saying Macintosh advertising came to mind first. Apple's recent advertising focused on price, since the company reduced the cost of selected Apple II models and Macintosh for the holiday season.

No. 2 in computer-category ad awareness again was IBM Corp., with 17.3% of first mentions, up one point from October. IBM also has been offering holiday shoppers rebates and price cuts.

Surprisingly, Commodore International's advertising came to mind first for only 5% of the November sample, unchanged from October's 5.4%, despite its $40 million campaign, via Ted Bates Advertising/New York, for the Amiga home computer (AA, July 29, et seq.). None of the 1,000 adults surveyed first recalled the Amiga name.

Cameras also were on shoppers' minds in November, with Canon making a 4.4 percentage-point advance to 16.5% of first mentions and Kodak adding 4.1 points to its category-leading 22.4% share. Minolta held on to its No. 3 position with 7.9% ad awareness, up 1.4 points from October.

Ads for Kodak's new Tele-disc, featuring actor Telly Savalas, broke in November issues of consumer magazines and December issues of women's service magazines, via J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago. Network tv spots for the entire disc line broke late in the November survey period and may show more of an effect in the December data.

Forever Krystle perfume, inspired by "Dynasty" character Krystle Carrington, moved to second place from 17th in the cosmetics and fragrance category. The perfume's ads captured 4.8% of first mentions, up 4.7 percentage points from October. Maybelline, however, maintained its No. 1 position with a 5.8% share, while Avon dropped to No. 3 with 4% of first mentions (down one point).

Both Forever Krystle and Carrington, the line's men's cologne from Charles of the Ritz, got heavy pre-Christmas ad pushes estimated at $3 million a month. Rosenfeld, Sirowitz & Lawson, New York, handles.

All that shopping can make one hungry and thirsty, and fast-food and soft drinks also helped swell the November list of adWatch gainers and losers. When respondents were asked which fast-food advertising came to mind first, it was McDonald's Corp. at the head of the line once again, with 49% of first mentions, up 5.7 percentage points to its largest recall share of 1985.

cuiting the efforts of competitors Burger King and Wendy's International with its barrage of couponing and media advertising for its new McD.L.T. sandwich. McDonald's spends an estimated $5.5 million a week pushing its menu lineup on tv via Leo Burnett USA, Chicago.

Troubled Burger King's share of first mentions dropped 4.4 percentage points from October to November. Its 10.1% share in November was its lowest score in 1985, but still good enough to keep the No. 2 position. BK's most recent attempt to regain its former sales momentum—the new campaign featuring the search for Herb, the only man in American who hasn't tried the Whopper—broke after the November adWatch survey was completed. J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, handles.

Rounding out the fast-food category are Wendy's with 9.5% of first mentions (down 2.2), Hardee's with 4% and Kentucky Fried Chicken with 2%. Like Burger King, Wendy's has seen little top-of-mind advertising awareness improvement after launching a major new campaign (the "Choose fresh, choose Wendy's" campaign from Dancer Fitzgerald Sample). One spot in that campaign, a Joe Sedelmaier-directed spoof of a Soviet fashion show, has gotten some attention but began its network run late in November, after that month's survey was completed.

Ad recall for Coca-Cola continued to fizzle last month, dropping 4.5 percentage points to 37.2% of first mentions, although that still was good enough to keep the top spot in the soft-drink category. Coke's awareness has been dropping steadily since July when the furor over new Coke (introduced in April) and Coke Classic began dying. The company moved its Coke Classic account to SSC&B from McCann-Erickson in mid-November to separate the two products and their ad campaigns.

Pepsi Cola remained No. 2 in the soft-drink category with 27% of first mentions. Diet cola products made a big pre-holiday showing: Diet Coke and Diet Pepsi tied for third with 2.9% shares, enough to bump 7Up, which placed third in the October survey, into the No. 5 spot (with 2.6% of first mentions).

AdWatch is a joint project of Advertising Age and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. Ad awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample of consumers to name ads in a variety of product categories that first come to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

In November, 1,000 adults were questioned by telephone. Under adWatch methodology, an increase or decrease of 2.8 percentage points is considered statistically significant and attributable to more than sample variation.

The top 10 in over-all, unaided awareness (without asking for a specific product category) in November were, in descending order: Coca-Cola, McDonald's, Miller/Miller Lite, Budweiser/Bud Light, Ford, Pepsi, AT&T, P&G's Pampers, Burger King and IBM.

Among other significant changes in the November survey results:

- Villa Banfi's Riunite, the nation's No. 1-selling imported wine, posted a 4.3 percentage-point gain in November ad awareness to remain in first place in the wine category. Advertising for the brand resumed Nov. 4 after being suspended Oct. 31 following a voluntary recall of 400,000 cases of wine suspected of being tainted with diethylene glycol. Despite the recall, Riunite's 14.4% share of first mentions in November was a 12-month high. The brand's previous high was 12.2% in May. Hicks & Greist, New York, handles.

Gallo stayed in second place with 6.2% awareness (from 6.4% in October) and those two lovable gentlemen who hawk Gallo's Bartles & Jaymes wine cooler held on to third with 4.4% of first mentions (from 3.1%).

- Top-of-mind awareness of Alpo brand dog food jumped 4.1 percentage points to 10.8% from 6.7% of first mentions in October in the pet food category. New ads for canned and dried Alpo dog food broke Oct. 28 via Weightman Inc., Philadelphia.

That gain wasn't enough to bump Purina out of the No. 1 position. Purina's ads came to mind first for 10.9% of the sample (up from 10% in October). Quaker Oats' Kibbles & Bits remained in the third spot with a 6.1% share (from 4.4% in October).

- Anheuser-Busch continues to lead a charmed life in the beer category. Bud's share of first mentions rose 3.2 points to 16.3% from 13.1%. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis, handles Bud.

Archrival Miller Brewing, meanwhile, launched a new multimillion-dollar campaign for superpremium Lowenbrau Nov. 1 (from JWT, Chicago), and advertising for the brand came to mind first for less than 1% of the sample, good enough for 13th place. Miller's Miller High Life brand held the No. 3 spot with 9.8% of first mentions, down from 11.6% in October.

Coors still was No. 2 in top-of-mind awareness with 10.9% of first mentions in November, off from 11.3% in October.

- Tylenol brand pain reliever's ad awareness hung on to the top spot in the medicine and drugs category, despite dropping 4.2 percentage points to a 22.4% share. McNeil Consumer Products Co.'s Tylenol continues to use its campaign featuring satisfied users who first learned about the pain reliever while they were in the hospital. Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, New York, handles. American Home Products' Advil came in second with 6.3% of first mentions (up from third) while Sterling Drug Co.'s Bayer dropped to third place from second with a 4.9% share.

- Hopscotch is still the name of the game between General Foods' Maxwell House and Procter & Gamble's Folgers brands in the coffee category. This time, Maxwell House's ad recall dropped 4.3 percentage points to 21.2% of first mentions to land the brand in second place. Folgers' ad recall was up to 22.2% from 20.8%, for first place, while Sanka remained No. 3 with a 5.7% share of first mentions.

Maxwell House is relying on its "Hal & Duke" campaign, via Ogilvy & Mather, New York, which follows the travels of a man and his dog as they visit craftspeople in various American cities.

The 1985 Ad Dollar Summary lists 35,000 Brands and how much they spent in 7 Media.

You can't buy this complete listing anywhere else.

These are the official industry figures. If you want to know who's spending what on advertising, BAR/LNA's Ad Dollar Summary is the reference tool you need.

Because only in this one volume will you find a complete summary of ad dollars from the PIB Magazine and Newspaper Supplement Service, from BAR's Broadcast Services and from the LNA Outdoor Advertising Service.

These are the very same figures LNA prepares for major media organizations like MPA, TVB, RAB, and OAAA. They're used by leading advertisers and their agencies. The trade journals also turn to LNA for media data.

The 1985 Volume now includes cable TV. The Ad Dollar Summary tells you how much each of 35,000 brands is spending in consumer magazines, newspaper supplements, network and spot television, network radio, outdoor advertising, and now, for the first time, in cable TV.

Brands are listed in alphabetical order along with their parent company identifications and the media used.

And that's not all. For the first time we've added listings that show the top 100 companies ranked by expenditures in each of the media.

Top 1000 Companies by total ad dollars. The Ad Dollar Summary includes other vital reference data.

For instance, there's a convenient listing of Top 1000 Companies ranked in order of total media expenditures and broken out in each of the seven media.

There's also a section in the year-end edition showing the top 10 brands in 275 product categories, with a category total.

Year-End 1984 Edition on sale now. If you didn't subscribe to the last year's Ad Dollar Summary, now is your chance to order the entire year round-up in one conveniently bound edition for just $150.00.

Multi-Media Services from BAR/LNA. The Ad Dollar Summary is just one of the Multi-Media reports we offer, and the only one available without subscribing to the full service. Our full-service subscribers receive two additional reports which complement the Ad Dollar Summary with more detailed analyses.

- Company/Brand—an alphabetical listing of companies and how much is spent on each brand in seven media.
- Class/Brand—compares competitive brands within 275 product categories. This enables you to see not only how much each brand spent in specific media, but also who the major spenders are in each category.

This data has been provided by Media Records for exclusive publication in Advertising Age and may not be reprinted or published in any form without explicit permission from Media Records. All newspapers represented are subscribers to Media Records. For those newspapers that subscribe to Media Records National Advertising Reporting Service Total Advertising data shown has been supplied by the publisher to Media Records and included in this compilation. All publisher supplied figures are converted to MRCS SAU inches by Media Records. These newspapers are indicated with an asterisk (*).

REPORTING METHODOLOGY

Media Records continues to measure in image but due to the introduction of the SAU 6 column format Media Records has designed and developed a methodology with the approval of our subscribers, the NAME Measurements Committee, The ANPA NAB Working Committee, The AAAA Newspaper Committee and other industry groups.

The approved methodology is titled The Media Records Conversion System (MRCS) and is based upon the printed page area of each product of the newspaper and is a five step approach as follows:

1. Measure Printed Page
   Width and Depth in Inches
2. Determine Square Inches of Page
   Multiply Width by Depth Inches
3. Determine the Number of SAU Inches of Page
   Divide the Square Inches by 2 0625 (SAU Inches)
4. Measure the Total Lines of the Page
   Multiply Column Depth Agate Lines by the Number of Columns on the Page
5. Determine the Factor for Converting Measured Lines to Reported SAU Inches
   Divide the Total Lines of Page by the Number of MRCS SAU Inches of the Page

Elkhart, Ind., and Ayerst Labs, New York.

They are aiming to take on not just Os-Cal but another product that, though over 60 years old, has found new life through calcium-supplement claims: Tums antacid.

Beecham Products' Northcliff-Thayer unit, Tarrytown, N.Y., markets Tums. An estimated $7 million-plus campaign via Jordan, Case, Taylor & McGrath, New York, claims in radio ads that Tums is an "inexpensive way to prevent calcium deficiency and osteoporosis" and that "thousands of women are following their doctors' advice and taking Tums daily to avoid this brittle bone disease."

That 10-month-old campaign was attacked last July as unsubstantiated, reportedly by Lederle and Ayerst, in claims filed with National Advertising Division of the Council of Better Business Bureaus.

NAD upheld the Tums campaign because "the advertiser substantiated all of the charges."

Tums sales could not be determined, but a source said that Tums' sales have increased dramatically since calcium-benefit claims were added to the product's advertising. Norcliff-Thayer, which also markets Avail vitamins containing calcium and Calcimax, a calcium supplement, declined comment.

The latest challenge to Tums comes from Warner-Lambert, which in December started rolling Theracal national (AA, Dec. 9).

The new mint-flavor, chewable calcium tablets in "the first easy-to-carry pack" are priced at about half the cost of leading bottled calcium supplements, Warner-Lambert says.

Theracal, with 334 milligrams of calcium per tablet, is priced at 50¢ for a 12 pack and $1.79 for a box of four-stick packs; Tums antacid, with 200mg of calcium per tablet, is priced at about 50¢ a roll in the New York area and about $2 for a bottle of 75. W-L also markets Suplical, a vanilla-flavor chewy calcium supplement.

Branded calcium supplements cost from $4 to $8.50 a bottle.

"This has the convenience and the low cost, and it's 100% [pure] elemental calcium," said Marshall Molloy, W-L manager-media relations.

Theracal, which has not yet been advertised, is handled by J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. W-L declined to release details of the first Theracal campaign, which is scheduled to start sometime this year.

Ironically, W-L's Rolaids competes directly with Tums in the antacid category. Rolaids also contains calcium but is not marketed as a calcium supplement.

Instead, advertising for Rolaids, via Ted Bates Advertising/New York, continues to emphasize its antacid properties, though Rolaids commercials now also mention the added benefits of calcium.

The challenge to ad claims for Tums is not the only example of a marketer charging that a competitor's calcium-supplement advertising is questionable.

Last year, Marion Labs retracted a print ad for Os-Cal after the National Dairy Research & Promotion Board, Arlington, Va., filed a false ad claim with the Federal Trade Commission. Marion blamed a typographical error for the claim that a person must eat 3 lbs. of cheddar cheese a day to get enough calcium. The ad was later pulled.

Each advertiser is scrambling to find unique selling propositions for essentially the same product.

Print and tv advertising for Lederle's Caltrate, via Carrafiello, Diehl & Associates, Irvington, N.Y., tells consumers that adding Caltrate to the diet gives "more pure calcium than a half quart of milk—without the calories."

Tv and print ads that have been running since August for Ayerst's Posture brand point out that good posture may be lost as one ages without taking Posture now. Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, New York, handles.

The dairy board also jumped onto the calcium bandwagon last year, via a $12 million tv and print campaign themed "Dairy foods—calcium the way nature intended."

The board has budgeted $16.9 million for this year's calcium campaign, which will begin in February via McCann-Erickson, San Francisco.

The theme will be basically the same, except with greater emphasis on nonmilk sources of calcium, such as cheese.

In 1984, $3 million was spent on advertising Os-Cal and $6 million on Caltrate.

The first calcium supplements were simply uncoated elemental calcium, but marketers are now adding special features.

Miles Labs' Bio-Cal and Marion's Os-Cal have introduced line extensions with vitamin D, and Ayerst plans to roll out a line extension of Posture with vitamin D this month. Caltrate, which was initially uncoated, is now coated and offered in a smaller size for "ease of swallowing."

More products offering calcium as a secondary benefit are coming on the market. Miles Labs in 1984 took its well known One-A-Day Vitamins Plus Iron off the market and replaced it with Within, a multi-vitamin with iron and calcium. Marion Labs offers Os-Cal Plus, a multi-vitamin with calcium.

Most calcium marketers also offer supplements in various dosages. Ayerst, for example, this year will roll out a 300mg version of Posture (compared with its current 600mg tablet).

"The big issue is convenience," said Marion's Mr. Rouse. "How many should you take [to get the 1,000mg of the recommended daily allowance]—one, two or five?"

Another area of competition is in research to determine new uses for calcium.

One study, partly financed by Miles Labs and released in early December by the Oregon Health Sciences University, Portland, suggests that calcium supplements may help manage high blood pressure in some adults. Miles Labs, as well as other calcium marketers, said it is still too early to make any definitive claims in this area and, therefore, will not touch on it in marketing programs.

But "in years to come, additional studies might establish possible new uses [for calcium]," a Miles spokeswoman said.#

theme will be used in outdoor and print ads as well. The campaign is the first for the brand from Grey Advertising, Los Angeles, which earlier replaced Basso & Associates, Newport Beach, as Moctezuma's agency.

The Desert Inn Hotel, Las Vegas, named McAuliffe & Fishel, Los Angeles, to handle its $2.5 million account, held by Kelly & Reber, Las Vegas, for almost 10 years. Other finalists were HCM, Los Angeles, and R&R Advertising, Las Vegas. Separately, Kelly & Reber is negotiating to merge with R&R.

TBWA Advertising has pushed back plans to open a California office (AA, Sept. 16). New York-based TBWA president Richard Costello said the agency will not expand into California until the situation is right—meaning until it finds a desirable acquisition candidate. Mr. Costello speculated that TBWA likely will expand into California in 1987 or 1988, "probably, but not necessarily," in Los Angeles.

McLean-Stewart Advertising, San Mateo, Cal., has merged with Wenger Associates, San Francisco, to form an agency with combined billings of $11 million. The two agencies continue to operate under their respective names. No client conflicts were reported.

Blue Ribbon Marketing, Portland, Ore., will break an animated and live-action tv commercial for its Heathcliff's Blue Ribbon cat litter in four western markets, probably Denver, Los Angeles, Phoenix and Salt Lake City, in March. The commercials, like the outdoor boards that precede them, will use the slogan "The competition stinks." Blue Ribbon also will expand distribution of the litter to Chicago, Texas and St. Louis, by late February. Osborn & Associates, Portland, is the agency.#

The Trix Rabbit, popularized for more than 30 years in tv spots for General Mill's Trix cereal, has found a friend. In the first of a two-part series of spots that broke Jan. 4, the Trix Rabbit is joined by another famous hare, Warner Bros.' Bugs Bunny. In part one, Bugs offers to help the Trix Rabbit get a taste of his favorite cereal with a new disguise. What is it? Bugs isn't telling until the second spot breaks March 17. apparel and soft-goods agency.

Sears' planned magazine boost reverses its trend away from that medium. Magazine ad spending in 1984 was $21.9 million, 35% below the $33.6 million it spent in 1983. Through the first half of last year, Sears spent $5.9 million on magazine advertising, compared with $10.4 million during the first half of 1984, according to Leading National Advertisers.

But in the second half of last year, Sears unveiled a series of bolder magazine ads—frequently involving multiple pages—as it began broadening and enhancing its product lines (AA, July 22).

Tv spots that sell the "total store" will continue to play an "important part" in the company's attempt to increase customer traffic between departments, Sears said. Those total-store campaigns, however, increasingly will give way to tv and print ads that take a more personal tone and spotlight products for various family members.

Under this individualized approach, three tv spots replace one. One spot may target fathers with a message about power tools, while another may pitch the new Stefanie Powers clothing to mothers. Yet another may try to convince children that Sears is the place to shop for fashionable clothing.

This product-oriented focus also gives Sears more freedom to experiment, to try moods and production techniques such as those used in the austere Stefanie spots that may not be appropriate for the total-store campaigns. It also enables Sears to tout its traditional strength in hardware, while upgrading its image in apparel—without diluting either message by blending them, Sears said.#

LMS—'Advertising is the rock 'n' roll of the business world'

LMS means fine ads

Leonard Monahan Saabye is the advertising equivalent of the rock world's overnight smash. A 6-year-old agency billing just $20 million, it was unknown outside New England until it coolly walked away with 31 awards at New England's Hatch Advertising Awards (one of the nation's biggest regional awards shows) in September. A feat made more remarkable by the fact that they cleaned up 21 awards at the 1984 show. Further adding to the agency's rising reputation was the controversial decision to award "Best of Show" to LMS' consumer magazine campaign for Marlin Firearms. See Page 4.

Out of the agency

When the creative team of Gary Johns and Jeff Gorman left Chiat/Day to hang their shingle as independent tv commercial directors, they expected to wait six months for the phone to ring. Six months later, they didn't have a phone. Too busy. But they did have four commercials on their reel. And even though Johns & Gorman Films only recently rented office space, the principals are quickly gaining confidence that there is life after Chiat/Day. See Page 23.

Special Report—Consumer Electronics

Efficiency and entertainment are the building blocks of the consumer-electronics industry. Marketers are selling and consumers are buying products ranging from compact-disc players to computerized telephones and from stereo tvs to colorful small appliances. The Yankee Group estimates about 11% of American families are now "technologically advanced," meaning they use technology to improve their quality of life. Starting on Page 9.

Presstime

Discover goes national

CHICAGO—Sears Financial Network has moved up to this month the national rollout of its Discover credit/financial services card. Spreads break Jan. 23 in the New York Times, USA Today and Wall Street Journal, followed by two 60-second spots airing Jan. 26 during Super Bowl XX. The estimated $40 million "Dawn of Discover" campaign, handled by J. Walter Thompson USA, will include continuous direct mailings, national and local print ads, plus network and local radio and tv spots throughout 1986. A Sears spokesman said the national launch was moved up from April "due to overwhelming response" to the card in Georgia and San Diego pilot markets.

Pepsi to sign Glenn Frey

PURCHASE, N.Y.—Pepsi-Cola USA reportedly is closing a deal today with former Eagles singer Glenn Frey, who will team up with "Miami Vice" star Don Johnson (AA, Dec. 26) as the headliner in Pepsi commercials this year. BBDO, New York, handles.

Cooler response to Bears

STOCKTON, CAL.—California Cooler is placing large football-shaped stickers, tied to the run for Super Bowl XX, on supermarket refrigerators carrying its product. The Brown Forman unit hopes the Los Angeles Rams will upset the Chicago Bears Jan. 12 to give the "One more reason to hate California" tag line added meaning. Chiat/Day, San Francisco, handles.

Merrill Lynch eyes five

NEW YORK—Merrill Lynch has narrowed to five the list of agencies in contention for its $40 million account (AA, Nov. 18). Finalists are N W Ayer; Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt; Dancer Fitzgerald Sample; Grey Advertising, and incumbent Young & Rubicam.

Sweet ad news for tv

WASHINGTON—The Sugar Assn. is looking to tv advertising to fend off gains made by G.D. Searle & Co.'s NutraSweet and other sweeteners. The industry trade group will test tv for the first time in May as part of its $3 million ad budget. A spot promoting sugar as a natural, low-calorie sweetener will air in two unnamed markets. North Castle Partners, Greenwich, Conn., handles.

Postal head is bottom-liner

WASHINGTON—The naming this week of Albert Casey, former chairman of American Airlines and former president of Times Mirror Co., as U.S. Postmaster General is expected to intensify U.S. Postal Service attention on its finances. Mr. Casey replaced postal veteran Paul Carlin, in office for just a year. The move was attributed in part to a push by the USPS board to become more competitive with growing private delivery services.

With most media predicting a soft sales picture in the first half of 1986, do you see any new advertising categories that will emerge to pick up the slack?

James Spero, senior vp-media director, Doyle Dane Bernbach/West, Los Angeles: "Not really. The reason is that the softness is very general; buying won't flow from newspapers into television or vice versa. It has affected all media and no new categories like the computer field of the past are on the horizon. Categories don't develop that quickly."

J. SPERO

Charles Bachrach, senior vp-network and programing, Western International Media, Los Angeles: "I'm not sure we'll see new or developing categories. What we might see is current categories rethinking what they buy. Spending patterns may change; for example, advertisers who don't have sale or release dates and can hang around and wait may come to the forefront. There may be a shift to more opportunistic spending rather than scatter. You may see, not on national tv, but on cable, new categories like real estate investment and health products."

Marshall Karp, executive vp-creative director, Marshalk Co.: "No. Granted, with the availability of 15-second commercials a lot of smaller advertisers will now be able to afford to go on the tube. However, they won't have big enough budgets to have a major impact on the networks' problems. For the media to turn around, the economy will have to turn around."

M. KARP

C. BOTWAY

Clifford Botway, chairman, Clifford A. Botway Inc., New York: "I don't see it happening in the coming year. I do believe we'll see some increase in the service categories, such as financial services, but there will be no substantial increases to cover or compensate for the computer hardware and software category cutbacks."

Howard Nass, senior vp-media, Cunningham & Walsh, New York: "The high-tech guys who spent tons of money are coming to a standstill. There are only some left who spend reasonable amounts. The only things that may change the market are politics, since some Senate seats are coming up, and maybe the airline wars, which are warming up. These megamergers may also change things. Two years ago I would have said computers or banks. Now there's a trend toward brokerage houses going toward the average joes.

Families tune in for efficiency, entertainment

By Len Strazewski

Dinner is in the kitchen microwave and Ozzie is crunching numbers on his personal computer in the den. Harriet is running late and calls in on the station wagon's cellular telephone.

Ricky is listening to a compact disc in his bedroom and David is watching a "Dynasty" rerun he taped last night on the family room videocassette recorder.

They'll soon gather at the table for their evening meal, but a few minutes after, each will return to his own electronic hearth for homework or the evening's entertainment.

Is this the typical American family? Not yet, but a lot has happened since the days when everyone clustered around the single family tv set to watch the misadventures of the Nelson family or sat around the one radio or phonograph to hear Ricky sing "Hello, Mary Lou." Ever-busier families are investing a substantial share of their disposable income to make their homes as efficient and entertaining as possible.

The Yankee Group, a Boston-based market research company, estimates about 11% of American families, or about 9.2 million households, are now "technologically advanced families," about twice as many as a decade ago.

These families are integrating consumer electronics into their life styles—planning their schedules on personal computers, waking up to digital alarms, cooking in microwave ovens, listening to personal stereos on their way to work or school and spending their evenings listening to high-fidelity audio or watching time-shifted tv programing on vcrs.

"TAFs are the families that master technology for the purpose of furthering their quality of life and fostering the participation of the family unit in the computer age," says Yankee Group senior analyst Donna Amrhein. "But they don't just buy anything with bells and whistles."

Tv marketers try to focus advertising picture

By Pat McGeehan

Most consumers can remember when the biggest choice they had to make before buying a tv was whether to get a color or a black-and-white set.

It's not that simple anymore.

Today, black-and-white tvs are passe and color tvs are available from pocket size to screens large enough to cover a wall. The "boob tube" has given way to command centers that can receive signals from outer space and control everything from a multimedia home entertainment system to family finances.

Consumer electronics technology has been progressing at a dizzying rate in the past few years, leaving tv makers racing to the market with the latest features without spending much time or money to explain to consumers what's what.

With an ever-increasing number of competitors in the field—several Korean companies have entered the U.S. market in the '80s—a costly price war is being waged. As prices and margins plummet, one of the first manufacturer expenses to be slashed is advertising and promotion spending.

While high-end producers like Sony Corp. of America continue to advertise heavily, many of the low-end marketers rely on their big-spending counterparts and retailers to lure consumers to the point of sale, where they hope their prices will speak for themselves. Fierce pricing battles have divided tv buyers into two basic groups: Videophiles who appreciate new high-tech features and are willing to pay for them as soon as they're available, and price-conscious purchasers looking for a bargain.

"We've done a great job of training the consumer to be very price-sensitive," says Lucy Sherrill, with more than a hint of sarcasm. Ms. Sherrill is marketing manager-color tv for General Electric, Fairfield, Conn.

Zenith tv ads, including one produced and broadcast in stereo, promote its "Smart sets." Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, handles.

Ms. Sherrill says she thinks high-tech innovations, such as flat picture tubes, larger screen sizes and stereo sound, will help reverse price and margin erosion—at least for a while. The key, she says, will be for tv marketers to find ways to reduce their costs so the inevitable price-cutting won't decimate profits.

The introduction of stereo, or multichannel sound (mts) as it is known officially, is looked to as the most likely savior of a flat tv industry. Penetration of color tv is very close to the 100% mark, and 1985 sales are expected to be up only about 4% over 1984.

Because the average lifespan of a modern color tv is eight to ten years, tv makers have sought to accelerate replacement of current sets by developing new, must-have features. In stereo, most think they have hit on such a selling point.

"What stereo has done," Ms. Sherrill says, "is made sound quality the No. 2 or 3 attribute that consumers are looking for when buying a tv. Three years ago, sound quality would have been near the bottom of the list."

"The excitement of stereo tv sound is like the excitement that was caused by stereo audio sound 15 to 20 years ago," says Dick Komiyama, president of image display devices for Sony, Park Ridge, N.J. "Sound quality has always been a very important aspect of home entertainment. As home electronics is getting more sophisticated, one area that has been slow in developing is tv sound. Even home vcrs, which was a much later development than tv, had stereo capability before tv."

Development of stereo tv and stereo broadcast technology was slowed by a basic chicken-and-egg dilemma. Tv makers were in no hurry to market stereo tvs when there was scant stereo programming on the air. Commercial broadcasters, meanwhile, had no incentive to invest in stereo broadcasting equipment when consumers were unable to receive the signal.

Hardware producers showed they were willing to meet broadcasters halfway by manufacturing tvs capable of receiving stereo sound—but not by themselves. The sets, which cost $100 to $200 more than conventional tvs, have multiplex (mpx) jacks through which a separate mts decoder can be connected.

While the commercial networks fiddled, the Public Broadcasting Service, led by Chicago's WTTW-TV, began airing a smattering of programs, mostly musical, in stereo. PBS-type broadcasting doesn't attract the masses, however, so only true audio/videophiles were encouraged to plunk down more than $1,000 to experience the added dimension.

Not until NBC-TV stepped away from the pack in 1984 and began broadcasting selected programs, including the Major League Baseball All-Star Game and "The Tonight Show," in stereo did it begin to take shape as a wave of the future. NBC now makes available 20 hours of stereo programing a week, most notably music-oriented shows such as "Miami Vice." More than 50 NBC affiliates broadcast in stereo.

ABC-TV this season offered only one regular program, "The Insiders," in stereo, but the network says it is gearing up to expand its offerings. CBS-TV says it has no immediate plans to join in.

Industry experts say as many as 250 stations will be airing some portion of their programing in stereo early this year and many expect to see that number rise by about 100 during 1986.

Now that NBC has shown its commitment to stereo, "the other networks will be dragged into it," says Tom Lauter-up and away from the electronics buffs who used to lead the consumer electronics field, Ms. Amrhein says. Because they buy practical products with mass-market potential, these families are the group for electronics marketers to watch.

"They are the investigators and they make the decisions as to whether a product offers enough performance for the price. What they do determines the direction of the mass market, since their homes become showcases for the products," she says.

Like the steady growth of the technologically advanced family, the direction of the consumer electronics mass market is up. Since 1975, factory sales of consumer electronics products in the U.S. more than quadrupled from about $5.2 billion to $23.4 billion in 1984, according to the consumer electronics division of the Electronic Industries Assn., Washington. Including retail markups, the domestic consumer electronics market topped $35 billion in 1985, according to industry estimates.

Color tv sales have more than doubled from $2.3 billion in 1975 to more than $5.5 billion in 1984. Audio systems and components grew from $1.1 billion to almost $1.9 billion during that period, and even home radios, the oldest consumer electronics product category and generally considered the most static, grew from $372 million in 1975 to $661 million in 1984.

New products such as home computers, software, videogames, telephones, telephone answering devices and videodiscs stimulated additional industry growth of about $5.7 billion in 1984, up from about $7 million in 1980 when the industry first began recording those categories.

"What's happened is that over the years, the consumer electronics industry has moved from the high-tech gadget business into the home entertainment business—and now it's moving into the life-style business," says Jack Wayman, senior vp of the EIA and founder of the twice-yearly Consumer Electronics Show.

"When we first founded CES, we considered calling it the Home Entertainment Show, but we changed our minds at the last minute to broaden the subject areas. I'm glad we did," Mr. Wayman says. "We wanted the show to demonstrate how consumer electronics enhanced the quality of life. Now enhancing life styles has become the overriding goal of the show."

He says the 18-year-old CES mirrors the industry; since its founding, the industry has expanded from three basic product lines (tv, radio and audio equipment) to about 25 product lines, including video recorders and cameras, telephones, satellite dishes, computers, microprocessor-based appliances and even kitchen products such as microwave ovens.

Software marketers, including 3M, are stressing unified package designs in an effort to build brand loyalty.

Miniaturization and product economy also have spurred industry growth, he says. "As I promote the industry in speeches around the country, I can carry 15 of the 25 product lines around the country with me in a single footlocker."

Video is still the hot product area and has produced the most sweeping effects on the industry, observers say.

"Most people don't realize that video has become as influential a communications medium as cable television, broadcast television, magazines, whatever," says James Meigs, senior editor of Video Review, New York, the largest of the national video publications with more than 370,000 circulation, according to Audit Bureau of Circulations' June 30 report.

"The whole structure of the way people get entertainment has changed as a result of the video movement," he says. "People are making more and more changes in their home environment to enhance video use. People who had only a small interest in technology prior to their purchase of a vcr are now looking at larger screen color tvs, small projection tvs, enhanced sound systems and hi-fi speakers for their video components."

Hot video products for 1986 include hi-fi vcrs, stereo tvs or universal stereo decoders for existing units, and 8mm videotape for film buffs, he says.

• The need to manage this complex array of products has led to a trend toward integration of function and design.

"The nature of what consumers are looking for in electronics is a way to simplify their lives—a way to get their electronics to operate on an automatic basis," says William Smith, general manager-consumer electronics product department, General Electric, Portsmouth, Va.

Last year, General Electric introduced two electronic control products: The $500 Home-Minder, which allows consumers to use their tv screen to program and control home lighting, heating and entertainment equipment from a central panel, and the $150 Control Center, designed to link electrical systems that use infrared controls, such as vcrs, cable systems and some audio products.

"The consumer is concerned about the clutter that results from all these electronics, each with a separate control panel," Mr. Smith says. "Simplification has been the big trend for the past 10 years, and I expect it will continue to be so for the next 10 years and beyond."

In addition to miniaturization and integration, family involvement is shaping the marketing of consumer electronics products, marketers say.

"We've gone to a family package design for all our software

Fashion appeal colors product lines

By Pat McGeehan

Upon entering the average American home of the middle '70s, a guest may have felt compelled to don a pith helmet and safari jacket before venturing through the jungle of wood-grain electronics.

Wood grain, the conventional thinking went, is the only finish that could fit into the standard home design scheme. After all, what goes better with wood?

But today, as more and more social conventions fall by the wayside, electronics marketers are taking a new view. Why not liven up the place, they're saying to consumers, with a pink microwave and a green tv and a lavender clock/radio?

"People today are very life-style driven," says Dan Infanti, manager-corporate communications and marketing for Sharp Electronics Corp., Paramus, N.J. "In the past, Americans were willing to try new things outside but were more conservative inside."

Sharp, whose parent company is based in Japan, was one of the first electronics marketers to capitalize on the fashion appeal of colors when in 1984 it introduced the QT50, a portable radio/cassette player, in pink, green and white.

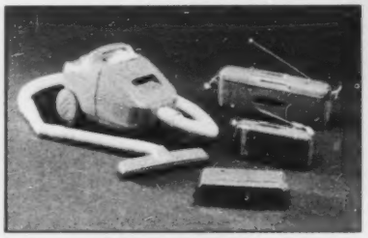
This week's Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas, Nev., features a full spectrum of color from several marketers.

"There will be a lot more color than you've ever seen," says Tom Lauterback, vp-pr for Franklin Park, Ill.-based Quasar, which in mid-1985 made a big splash with its Fashion Accents line of 10-in. tvs in several colors, which sell for $200.

Manual models of Fashion Accents will be available this year in white, blue, almond and pink. Models with remote-control units that look like mini-tvs already are available in red, white, yellow and blue, and the company plans to introduce new colors at this summer's CES in Chicago.

Quasar featured Fashion Accents in its 1985 magazine ads. But most companies aren't playing up color in their advertising, primarily because the products are low-priced and four-color print and tv advertising aren't.

In addition, Mr. Lauterback says, to some extent these products advertise themselves; he cites "how fantastic color is at the point of sale."



Quasar is trying to carry the popularity of Fashion Accents over into the portable audio segment by introducing Fashion Mini radio/cassette players in blue, red, yellow and black. The units resemble Sharp's QT50 but are a little slimmer.

"Just about everybody tried [colors] in the '60s," Mr. Lauterback says, pointing out that the idea never caught on then. "This time our timing was right."

This week's Consumer Electronics Show will feature color products from Sharp (l.), while Quasar will introduce new colors to its Fashion Accents line.

Greater emphasis also will be placed on color in Sony Corp. of America's new offerings, which already include 20 and 25-in. tvs in plum, beige, pearl and black (suggested retail prices: $900 and $1,200), says a spokeswoman for the Park Ridge, N.J.-based company. New technology comes along every few years, she says, "so I think color is going to be relied on more and more to provide excitement."

But at least one electronics company isn't getting too excited about color. After conducting focus group interviews, General Electric rejected the idea of adding colored cabinets to its tv line. "We did a bunch of consumer research and colors bombed," says Lucy Sherrill, General Electric's marketing manager-color tv. "What we found was that consumers wanted wood grain-type cabinets.

"Quasar has a hot little product in that [QT50]," she says. "But I think it's a small niche opportunity. The next company that tries to jump in there is probably going to be disappointed."

That would be bad news for Sharp, which this week is introducing colored tvs in screen sizes ranging from 13-in. to 3½-in. in black, blue, white, yellow, green and pink. Other colorful products Sharp is introducing this week include $125 Half Pint mini-microwave ovens in white, red, powder blue, pink and yellow; canister vacuums in white, green and pink, all with gray stripes; its first line of clock radios, in lavender, pink, green and white with a $25 price tag, and a compact, $50 version of the QT50 called the QT5 in white, lavender, pink and green.

Sharp sees the 18-to-34-year-old age group as the primary market for colored products, considerably younger than the target for high-end electronics. But that doesn't mean this passion for pastels is a passing fancy, Mr. Infanti says.

"We don't believe that color's a fad. We believe that this is a trend," he says. "And the ability to identify and create a trend is what separates the good companies from the great companies."

products such as audiotape, videocassettes and computer floppy discs," says Don Linehan, marketing communications manager of 3M, St. Paul, Minn. "The consistency of image and recognition is of great value as the market for these broadens."

As audio, video and computer hardware become more pervasive in the home, consumers will buy in larger amounts and seek consistent quality. Unified package designs will lead to that recognition and brand-loyal purchases, he says.

"And even though vcr penetration, for example, is only about 30%, we are already seeing focus group homes with two or three units. That means that the head purchaser of the family is buying a box of 10 videocassettes and distributing them to various family members for use on the units."

Advertising creative, managed by Grey Advertising, New York, also reflects the family motif, Mr. Linehan says. Print advertising for 1986 shows 3M's Scotch brand tape products in use in a family environment, and tv spots, still in production, split between family setting and high-tech features, he says.

Maxell Corp. of America, Moonachie, N.J., another tape manufacturer, also is marketing more directly to family users, according to Bill Tucker, senior vp and management representative of Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York, the company's long-time agency.

"There was a time when we marketed products to the audiophile, and what he was interested in was high tech," Mr. Tucker says. "Audio salespeople sold to audiophiles and the market was reached with magazines like Stereo Review.

"But as products got more sophisticated, they also got cheaper and available to more people. Now vcrs are available to mass markets and videotape must also be promoted for mass use," he says.

Tape manufacturers have become more like package goods marketers, fighting for shelf space with other manufacturers and other products.

"We can't just market high tech anymore and we can't talk down to consumers," Mr. Tucker says. "We have to acknowledge that our products are used by families and our advertising must reach broader markets."

Another Scali client, Sharp Electronics Corp., Paramus, N.J., also is modifying its marketing. A manufacturer of microwave ovens as well as other consumer electronics, Sharp is trying to develop brand loyalty that cuts across product lines, Mr. Tucker says.

"Seven or eight years ago, microwave ovens were generic. Now, brands are more diversified and it's important to emphasize brand quality," he says.

Above all, marketers are realizing that the technologically advanced family now is looking for quality, not just gadgets. Ozzie and Harriet wouldn't have it any other way.

Building the right look, sound into media room

By Van Wallach

The thing of the week is projection tv," says Alan Lucas of Alan Lucas & Associates, a San Francisco interior designer. "After the Mercedes, the Jacuzzi and the tennis courts, that's what my clients want."

But, Mr. Lucas says, "Without good planning this creates a large lump in the room, and looking at the black all-seeing eye is not pleasant."

For many of his clients, the solution is a media room, an expensive showcase of interior design and superb electronics. The design alone costs $20,000 minimum, the equipment another $5,000 to $150,000.

At this level, price becomes less a concern than aesthetics and audio-visual performance—and getting the right stuff requires more than a trip to the stereo store. "The big retailers aim for the middle-low market, not the middle-high," Mr. Lucas says.

Because customers usually lack the expertise to assemble packages, they and their interior designers rely on consultants, who may select ready-made equipment but customize it to fit a room's design.

Free-lance writer Van Wallach's media system includes two tvs and three radios in a one-bedroom apartment.

For example, audio consultant David Lynn, president of Sound Design & Engineering, North Miami Beach, Fla., refinishes components in brass, chrome, gold, lacquers—whatever the client wants. A new faceplate for a $1,800 Nakamichi USA Corp. cassette deck can cost $600. "I've had an artist paint speakers to match wallpapers," he says. "Concealment is important."

But even off-the-shelf components look better these days. Designers say the "dancing lights" syndrome, where manufacturers glitzed up equipment with blinking lights, is fading.

Leaders in electronics design emphasize clean, simple executions. Mr. Lynn likes Canton North America's speakers, priced at $250 to $3,500 a pair, which come in different colors and woods.

Both Mr. Lucas and Mr. Lynn mention Bang & Olufsen a/s, Struer, Denmark, as a pacesetter in stereo design as well as performance. In fact, New York's Museum of Modern Art displays 10 pieces of B&O equipment, according to Keld Hanson, audio products manager for Bang & Olufsen of America, Mount Prospect, Ill.

"Simplicity is the key," says Mr. Hanson, whose company uses rosewood, teak, oak and white birch in its products. "As electronics become extremely complex, other manufacturers put on knobs and buttons and dials. We package the complexity within. It's a European design approach."

In addition to these sophisticated off-the-shelf designs, companies package electronic products as so-called rack systems. RCA Corp.'s remote-controlled Dimensia system, for example, features a 40-in. projection monitor, stereo videocassette recorder, compact disc player, turntable and audiocassette deck.

"It's much easier to create an original look for a client that way," Mr. Lucas says.

Design problems start when consumers add components like compact disc players to existing systems and nothing matches. Mr. Lucas then opts to conceal the electronics in cabinets with doors.

"You can put new faceplates on the components," he says, "but to me that's not as good as getting an integrated unit."

But audio wizard Mr. Lynn has his doubts about the all-in-one approach, which he believes often results in a tradeoff between design and sound quality. "Packages look neat, and for $1,200 you can get a compact disc, dual cassette deck, the whole nine yards," he says. "They look great, but they are not great quality. The best equipment is not necessarily the prettiest.

"Enthusiasts who pay $5,000 for an audio amplifier aren't looking for aesthetics but for realistic sound."

TV POWER SHARES

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decidedly a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

It was holiday week at the networks, a fact amply reflected in their schedules. There was stunting as well as football bowl games, new series, Christmas specials. The erratic behavior of some of the usual winners showed it. Take Scarecrow & Mrs. King, which usually wins the laurels during its Monday berth: last week it nit the big 10 in share dominance. However, it is usually only a marginal winner at best. In fact, CBS got a lot of gifts during the week ending after New Year's Day. The network scored 11 wins in the top 30, virtually blasting ABC out of the water. ABC's problem was football. Monday night's Gator Bowl performance was inept at best, allowing four CBS shows impressive wins. A resurgent Monday Night Football this year has tackled the CBS Monday foursome without fail every week. Kate & Allie, Newhart, and Cagney & Lacey each had impressive upsets last week. But ABC's problems didn't stop there. A sour Sugar Bowl on Wednesday, pitting Miami against Tennessee, wiped out the sweetest night on the ABC schedule. The game got an amazingly bad 10 share. But while football hurt ABC, NBC's fortunes were enhanced by both the Rose and Orange Bowls. Thanks to a competitive match that did not deteriorate until late in the fourth quarter, NBC scored a 33 share on Wednesday night. However, the Wednesday night New Year's crown goes to CBS, which won the night with a movie, Intimate Strangers. Score one for sex versus football. The dominant shows of the year continued to display their winning ways. Cos, Family Ties and 60 Minutes show no sign of weakening. Missing from the front line was Dallas, preempted by The Kennedy Center Honors...Miami Vice built its audience base, even after moving to a temporary 9 o'clock berth. At 10, NBC threw in a rerun series, Fast Copy, which showed good numbers thanks to Vice...ABC is solidifying its hold on Tuesday night. The network handily won the night with its lineup but the network's schedule crew has to be particularly happy with Spenser: For Hire. This show finally edged out a fading Remington Steel. Both shows have been nip and tuck for several weeks now...NBC finally won the entire Saturday slate, a feat made possible by the absence of Love Boat. The Boat was temporarily berthed for an ABC News closeup, Growing Old in America. Saturday Night on NBC is geling. All of the net's shows, with the exception of Gimme a Break, now are winning with regularity.

1986: A challenging year for advertising

Budgets, media get scrutiny

By HERBERT ZELTNER

The "go-go" years for advertising spending in the U.S. seem to be ending.

Gone are double-digit annual increases in budgets accepted just to maintain "share of voice." Gone are 15%-to-20% hikes in media costs, passed on (after sometimes considerable grumbling) by agencies to clients and then by marketers to their customers.

And gone, as well, are many of the comfortable relationships and routine practices used to develop creative work and build media plans—well worn ways of doing things, refined and improved over a generation of remarkable stability and satisfaction.

It's been a golden age of network tv dominance, aggressive new-product introduction, record budgets and traditional package-goods leadership. But all this seems up for grabs now as advertising enters the second half of the 1980s, in the widely held view of members of the Advertising Age Editorial Sounding Board.

Some of the key findings of a poll dealing with spending trends, budget making and advertising productivity conducted during the fall of 1985:

- 1986 advertising budgets, over-all, will be up modestly, with a sizable minority holding even or dropping. Forty-eight per cent of panel participants (both client and agency) see spending levels up—but by less than 10%. Another 15% see them unchanged or actually cut. In fact, fewer than one in 20 expect budget increases above the 20% mark.

Agency management, on the other hand, is quite a bit more optimistic—with only one in eight expecting budget cuts in the coming year among their clients. But here, too, a more conservative view seems to be emerging. More than half the agency executives sense a slowdown in spending, in contrast to only 6% who see more rapid gains ahead.

- That this is a marked change from recent practice is borne out by the Sounding Board views on how spending trends are changing. Forty-one per cent of the company executives in our survey state that year-to-year budget hikes are slowing down. Another 27% note that dollar investments in

Ford sets review in Germany

By DAGMAR MUSSEY and JESSE SNYDER

The Ford Motor Co. in Germany is reviewing its $26 million account, and Young & Rubicam stands a good chance of taking it away from J. Walter Thompson Co., Ford's biggest agency in Europe.

A decision is expected by mid-February. Both JWT and Y&R are making presentations to Ford at the end of this month.

The decision will be made by executives from Ford of Europe, Ford of Germany and Ford's worldwide marketing staff, but is subject to review by Ford Motor chairman Donald Petersen, who will not sit in on presentations.

The German account is Ford's biggest on the European continent, although the U.K. account is bigger

Ohlmeyer gets $250 million in buying from Y&R

RJR broadcast goes in-house

By WILLIAM F. GLOEDE

R.J. Reynolds Industries has moved about $250 million in network and spot broadcast-media buying responsibility from Young & Rubicam to Ohlmeyer Communications, giving Reynolds the largest in-house media operation in the advertising business.

Reynolds, which acquired a 50% interest in Ohlmeyer when it merged with Nabisco Brands in June, had been considering the move for several months.

The switch to Ohlmeyer puts nearly all of RJR's $1.01 billion in measured and unmeasured media spending under the direct control of the company. That surpasses Procter & Gamble, which handled an estimated $412.7 million in network tv buys in-house in 1984, the latest full-year figure available.

Increasingly of late, major advertisers have moved media buying in-house from their agencies as they try to control rising costs and audience shifts among all media. Among the clients that have gone this route, in addition to RJR and its Nabisco unit, are Anheuser-Busch and Jos. E. Seagram & Sons (AA, Nov. 25). Others have reassigned media buying along daypart lines.

Sources, who would not speak for attribution, said they believe Dan Pearson, director of Reynolds' existing print and outdoor media unit, will oversee broadcast as well. RJR declined comment.

An agency executive who is familiar with Reynolds said he was not surprised by the move.

"They have the critical mass that makes it work," the executive said. He added, "Agencies don't really suffer" when a client takes media in-house.

'SI,' USA Cable Network join in ad package

New York—Time Inc.'s Sports Illustrated and USA Cable Network, which is one-third owned by Time, are selling a combined advertising package including time and space in both properties. Packages run from $50,000 to $1 million and are split evenly between print space and cable time. Time Inc. last week decided to sell its stake in USA Network, but a spokesman said that move will not affect this combined package deal.

Hasbro talks to 50 agencies; not done yet

Pawtucket, R.I.—Hasbro Inc. so far has talked to more than 50 shops in the initial stages of its search for a second agency. It plans to see perhaps a dozen more this week and next. Hasbro vp-marketing Al Carosi hopes to reach a decision by the end of February. Griffin Bacal, New York, will remain Hasbro's primary agency.

$2 mil in ads will back hot skincare item

By PAT SLOAN

New York—A new skincare system that promises to make skin look younger is lighting up the switchboard at Alfin Fragrances, which has fielded as many as 60 calls a day from consumers wanting to tap into the beauty industry's latest fountain of youth.

To be backed by an initial $2 million print campaign in March from Drossman, Lehmann & Marino here, the new hope in a bottle is called Glycel.

Its draw is a cellular substance developed by heart surgeon Christiaan Barnard and Switzerland's Schaefer Institute, which helped create synthetic penicillin (AA, Aug. 12).

Dr. Barnard's name will appear on Glycel packaging and again in print ads. The print ads, DL&M's first work for Alfin, also will carry Dr. Barnard's picture and a personalized text titled "Dr. Christiaan Barnard on Aging. . .A discussion on aging and its effects on the skin, by Christiaan Barnard, M.D."

The "magical" substance in Glycel is glycosphingolipid (GSL), described as a skin cell memory rejuvenator that binds to cells, helping skin look younger.

"The level of credibility here, I think, is outstanding," said Irwin Alfin, chairman of the cosmetics marketer. "From what I hear the consumer awareness level of Dr. Barnard is unbelievable," agreed Allan Mottus, a cosmetics consultant.

So far, retailers have purchased more than $5 million worth of Glycel, not yet enough to scare the competition. But Alfin expects Glycel to double the

Ford in Y&R's future? 1
The Ford Motor Co. in Germany is reviewing its $26 million account, and Young & Rubicam stands a good chance of taking it away from J. Walter Thompson Co., Ford's biggest agency in Europe. The decision is expected by mid-February.

Advertising in for changes 1
Recent years have been a golden age of network tv dominance, aggressive new-product introduction, record budgets and traditional package-goods leadership in marketing. But all this seems up for grabs now as advertising enters the second half of the 1980s, in the widely held view of members of the Advertising Age Editorial Sounding Board.

Do you know a muffin man? 3
The newest craze in specialty-food retailing is muffins. Sales of the home-style creations through specialty stores soon could reach $100 million a year, according to Chicago entrepreneur Dalia Ratner, a housewife who started All My Muffins, a three-store chain of muffin outlets in California and Illinois.

'Playboy' tries ad interruptus 3
Playboy will test two "interrupted" 30-second ads in three top markets as part of its first tv campaign from Smith Burke & Azzam, Baltimore. Each 30-second ad will be divided into 15-second segments, with the segments separated by a 10-to-30-second ad from another advertiser.

Mail rates safe—for now 4
Albert Casey's appointment as the nation's 67th postmaster general is not expected to directly affect advertiser mail rates.

INTV heavy on barter talk 6
The impact of barter syndication on programing was one of the most hotly debated topics, in both formal and informal sessions, at last week's convention of the Assn. of Independent Television Stations.

Amtrak conjures new campaign 12
"Magic" is the theme of a new Amtrak ad campaign that has to serve the dual purpose of attracting riders and rallying public sentiment for maintaining the passenger railroad system.

Retailers are winners 44
Seven retailers from the U.S. and Canada took first-place honors in the annual NoRMA Awards competition sponsored by the Newspaper Advertising Bureau. The winners were announced this week at the annual convention of the National Retail Merchants Assn.

Caesar sights syndication 60
Comedian Sid Caesar is hoping to conquer a new generation of tv viewers with a syndicated series culled from "Your Show of Shows," his long-running, award-winning series that ran in the 1950s.

The price of a new name 61
International Harvester Corp. will spend $13 million this year—"the bulk of it" on advertising—to announce its name change to Navistar International Corp., a moniker company officials admit was chosen for its lack of meaning.

WHAT DO YOU CALL 15,000 PEOPLE WHO SURVIVED BILLIONS OF DOLLARS OF DEBT, THE WORST RECESSION IN RECENT MEMORY, WERE WRITTEN OFF BY MOST OF THE EXPERTS, AND STILL CAME OUT ON TOP?

YOUR NEIGHBORS.

They work here in town. For the company that until today was known as International Harvester.
Together they weathered one of the most difficult series of crises any American corporation has ever faced.
Through it all, they were magnificent.
They responded to every adversity with hard work, determination, savvy and guts.
And consider what they accomplished.
Despite the hardships, they helped us become the industry leader, with trucks and engines known throughout the world for quality and efficiency.
Our manufacturing productivity has been doubled.
And our well-publicized debt has been cut by two-thirds.
Recently a divestiture has forced us to change our name.
So today IH is becoming Navistar International Corporation.

Spreading the 'word' 36
Borrowing from St. Paul's exhortations to the early Christians, ad exec John O'Toole argues in an essay that global advertising cannot succeed without a "sound doctrine" in place throughout the system or without a "word" to preach. Agencies, he says, need a set of beliefs that encourages the common good to transcend local interest.

Portuguese tv expects changes 39
Portuguese tv viewers may get an alternative to stodgy, state-run stations if the ruling Social Democratic party wins the Jan. 26 election. Portugal now has only one national tv channel, RTP 1, which broadcasts six hours per day, and a second Lisbon-based station, RTP 2. Both are government-owned and ad-supported. The party has vowed to cut state-owned media to one tv channel, one radio station and one daily newspaper.

Computer concerns hit home for CES

By BRIAN MORAN

Las Vegas—Sluggish home computer sales are the only bad apple in a bushel of good news for the consumer electronics business.

Sales of videocassette recorders and videotapes are booming, compact-disc-player sales have surpassed expectations and the prospects for both segments in 1986 are bright, according to figures released here at the winter Consumer Electronics Show by the Electronic Industries Assn., a Washington-based trade group.

Vcr sales are seen increasing to an '86 total of 12.5 million units, putting a unit in four out of every ten U.S. homes. Current vcr penetration is estimated at 30%.

In 1985, the movie industry

Nissan trucks out 'Hardbody'

By CLEVELAND HORTON

The fitness craze enters auto marketing when Nissan Motor Corp. USA puts all its marketing muscle behind this month's introduction of its "Hardbody" line of compact trucks.

The new line is touted by the No. 2 Japanese auto importer as "The most important truck advance in 25 years." The Carson, Cal.-based company will back the introduction with a multi-million-dollar ad campaign, including a buy on NBC-TV's Jan. 26 telecast of the Super Bowl.

William Esty Co., Los Angeles, developed the campaign for Nissan around the "Hardbody" concept, clearly aiming to

Barter dominates INTV shoptalk

By JAMES P. FORKAN

LOS ANGELES—The impact of barter syndication on programing was one of the most hotly debated topics at last week's convention of the Assn. of Independent Television Stations.

The topic dominated formal and informal discussions at the Century Plaza, and was fueled by the release of the latest barter study (see accompanying story).

Martin Brantley, president-general manager, KPTV, Portland, Ore., said barter has helped boost first-run programing, from children's cartoons to sitcoms such as "Too Close for Comfort" and events such as the Goodwill Games.

Dennis Gillespie, senior vp-marketing, Viacom Enterprises, New York, was among those who believe barter has cut into network more than spot sales.

Citing "very clear" evidence, Mr. Gillespie said at least one big spot category, toys, has boosted spot spending since becoming committed to a batch of bartered cartoon series.

As for the Big 3 nets' "frontal attacks" on barter, he felt those may be due to their concern that affiliates may come to see barter and network compensation as similar arrangements. In exchange for withholding big blocks of program and ad time, nets pay their affiliates fees totaling $500 million a year, nearly equal to barter's ad volume, he noted.

Barter also has created a "fiercely competitive" program environment that can only help the stations control their costs, said Mr. Gillespie, noting that 160 weekly hours of new fare are due this year.

Joel Segal, exec vp, Ted Bates Advertising/New York, said his clients have increased barter spending to 10% of their network/syndication budgets in 1985-86, up from 8% in 1984-85 and 6% in 1983-84.

"Barter is here to stay," in part because its first-run series deliver target demographics at "far lower cpms" than network shows, he said.

Still, Mr. Segal cautioned that barter has several shortcomings, including a more commercially cluttered environment than network series; station lineups, ratings and promotional support smaller than the nets' and uncertainty about when shows will air.

Moreover, he said, demographic ratings become available months after sponsors' campaigns end, making it difficult to implement make-goods.

Harry Stecker, senior vp-marketing director, Petry Inc., New York, was among those maintain-

Barter draws more ad $$: INTV study

LOS ANGELES—Ad spending on barter-syndication programs increased 23% last year.

Butterfield Communications Group, Cambridge, Mass., prepared a study on barter for INTV and Station Representatives Assn., New York.

Butterfield's David Butterfield said the survey was based on interviews with media directors at "most" of the top 25 tv advertisers; media directors and planners at 24 major agencies, and executives at syndicators, tv networks and station reps.

Among the findings:

- Advertisers spent an estimated $530 million on barter-syndication programs in 1985, up 23%. Barter-syndication ad sales will gain 19% to $630 million in 1986 and another 19% to $750 million in 1987.
- About 60% of general managers felt barter's growth has had a "greater negative impact" on national spot ad business than on the networks' ad sales.
- The average independent station carries 28 hours of barter fare weekly, versus eight for the average affiliate. While interest continues in offnet series, movies and specials, the study found stations' "real appetite is for first-run [series]."
- Most independent stations put the bulk of their barter programing into daytime slots (18.5%), followed by early fringe (15%) and weekend (14.6%). On the low end, late fringe accounted for only 5.6% of independent stations' barter inventory, prime time 4% and prime time access 1.8%. Affiliates put most of their barter in weekend (10%), with early fringe and access hovering around 9%.#

CORRECTIONS & CLARIFICATIONS

- The Chicago Reader's circulation was incorrectly reported in a Special Report story (AA, Nov. 7, P. 28). The Reader's actual circulation is 120,000.
- McCann-Erickson's work on Buick's Hispanic marketing program (AA, Dec. 30, P. 28) is handled by the agency's office in Troy, Mich., not the New York office, as reported.
- McDonald's franchisee Herb Peterson, rather than Art Bender, as reported, is credited with inventing the Egg McMuffin sandwich (AA, Dec. 30, P. 14).
- As noted in the caption in a chart on calcium supplements (AA, Jan. 6, P. 1), retail sales of the supplements in 1983 totaled $47 million. In another chart accompanying the story (P. 68), the agency for Suplical calcium supplements was listed incorrectly. It is Ted Bates Advertising/New York.#

advertising are, in fact, decreasing (one out of six termed the drop "significant").

- Profit contribution goals and other corporate financial dictates loom large in advertising budget-setting deliberations. More than half the advertiser members of the Sounding Board (55%) term these financial concerns "extremely important" in pegging spending levels in their own organizations. And agency executives are even more emphatic in this regard—64% noting this element as vital in their clients' thinking.

Moreover, sizable majorities on both the client and agency sides see these financial targets (both performance and bottom line-related) as growing in importance in the future.

- Individual company and agency experience colors, of course, the thinking of these executives about the national advertising scene. When asked what they personally believe will be the industrywide spending situation this year, 43% of the panel members expect a slowdown or decline in activity. Only 6% are bullish about increases in both dollars and advertising weight in 1986.
- Rates of growth and shrinkage are expected to vary widely among different categories of goods and services. Singled out for major growth and spending much faster than the average are consumer financial services, fast-food, communications and entertainment. Expected to drop behind—with possibly major declines from historic spending levels—are sectors such as tobacco, liquor and gasoline, as well as electronics and office equipment (this last after some spectacular, unsustainable bursts in advertising investment during the past few years).
- On the creative front, a great deal of activity seems to be under way as agencies and advertisers explore ways to improve the effectiveness of ad budgets.

An overwhelming 83% of the company executives represented tell us they are developing and testing new creative strategies and sales appeals. Three out of four are experimenting with new creative units and different formats. Three-quarters also are undertaking special efforts against specific-market segments and new targets.

The search seems to be intensifying as well for new sources of talent. One-third of these client managers say they are now tapping into creative resources either within their own companies or at their agencies. In fact, 17% are scouting for entirely new creative resources—looking at other agencies or considering special creative talent pools.

Confirming this apparently widespread search by clients for new creative departures, agency management also sees a great deal going on. Seven out of eight of the agency respondents say they are now involved in exploring special-segment efforts against new targets for their clients; 79% are developing and testing new creative strategies. Seven of ten are looking at new uses and applications for client products as well as working with different kinds of creative units.

- Activity seems to be increasing in many quarters in regard to media changes, also intended to enhance productivity. More than three-quarters of the panel state they are "presently more active than ever" in tightening and redefining prospect targets and using improved demographic data techniques to fine-tune plans. Three-fourths of the agency executives and two-thirds of the client members of our panel state they already are using, or at least testing, different media forms—such as direct mail, Yellow Pages, cable tv or out-of-home availabilities.

Two-thirds of the agency Sounding Board members tell us that clients are getting considerably more involved in media matters—and participating at much higher levels of management than ever before.

- The traditional balance between advertising and promotion spending also seems to be undergoing change. More than a third (35%) of the clients state that in their own companies, dollars are being moved toward promotion from media. In fact, 52% on the agency side see this same trend at work—obviously still another way advertising budgets are squeezed.
- Coloring a new realism about advertising-spending levels are some profound reservations about the effectiveness of advertising itself in the years ahead. More than one-quarter of the entire panel (26%) tell us they expect advertising will be less effective in the future to a marked degree. Concerns about clutter, "zapping," audience erosion and growing commercial volume all contribute to this sense of anxiety.

Close to half (42%) also see damage being done, but not to the same degree, since they feel that "advertising may be hurt a bit." Thus, more than two-thirds of this wide-ranging sample of executives share some pessimism about the power of the very promotion tool with which they work.

Only one in the entire sample feels any confidence that advertising is likely to improve in effectiveness in coming years.

- Views on what to do about the situation range across a wide gamut of reforms, improvements in technique and tighter professional discipline. Strong cries for more direct attention to real consumer needs and speaking with clarity and honesty come through. Many calls for better discipline in the matter of clutter occur throughout the responses.

Quite a few executives stress the need for more work on the professional relationship between advertisers and their agencies as a major means to enhance the productivity of advertising.

The picture that emerges, then, is a striking and sobering one. Several reasons for an emphatic slowdown in ad spending have been offered by industry experts with whom we've discussed the findings. Among the explanations:

1. Advertising, traditionally viewed as a lagging economic indicator, is simply now adjusting to much lower rates of inflation. With the double-digit hikes in prices throughout the general economy of the late 1970s and very early '80s now down to the 3%-to-5% range, it seems it was only a matter of time until advertising itself makes this sometimes painful adjustment. In this view, advertising costs are merely echoing the lowered expectations and demands of labor unions and suppliers of goods and services elsewhere in the economy in recent months.

2. Another interpretation is that top management at many major marketing companies had been convinced that continuing escalation of advertising investments was necessary in order to build broader and more secure franchises in the marketplace. The time may have come when these top executives have simply decided that investment should stop and some of the anticipated rewards be reaped at the bottom line. In this view, it's now time to start cutting back promotion expenses and improving margins.

3. Still another thought reflects

3.2 MILLION YANKEE READERS DIG THE LATEST DIRT

The homeowners who read Yankee sink a lot of money into their gardens. They spend big bucks on their patios. And they remodel their homes regularly. According to the 1985 MRI study, Yankee is a more efficient way to reach these happy homeowners than Country Living, House Beautiful, Southern Living or Sunset.

And if you're selling garden fertilizer, mowers, lawn furniture or do-it-yourself items, you'll find a greater concentration of your prime prospects reading Yankee.

Greater than Better Homes & Gardens or practically any other shelter book surveyed.

MRI also proves that Yankee's lively, straightforward editorial style sparks greater interest in home and garden products than just about any book on your schedule.

the wide attention being given to megamergers among big-budget consumer-goods marketers. This opinion suggests that many top-ranked advertisers are preoccupied with current profit performance and are taking steps to fend off undesirable merger bids or get a good price from a friendly suitor by holding all possible expenses down.

4. Yet another view holds that top management has gotten a great deal more skeptical and hard-nosed about the sometimes considerable expense involved in advertising. As a new, younger breed of highly trained financial experts moves to the top rung of major American corporations, they appear not to be as willing as their predecessors to accept ambitious marketing and advertising programs on faith. They want some reassurance that investments made through advertising will pay off in actual sales performance and are becoming a great deal more demanding about minimizing risk before expenditures are approved.

For the Ad Age Editorial Sounding Board over-all, close to two-thirds see media spending up less than 10%—at best—and a goodly number within this majority see budgets unchanged or actually being cut. In fact, fewer than one in 20 expects increases on the high side, up 20% or more (Table 1).

Advertisers show a wider range of views than do their agency executive counterparts. Although one-third of the clients see 1986 spending in a "bullish" light—up 10% or more—a significant one-quarter expects this year's spending to hold unchanged or drop to some degree. Three marketing heads anticipate severe cuts in the vicinity of 50%. What we see at work here is a checkerboard pattern of variations both by product category and corporate health.

Agency management, on the other hand, when considering what their clients' spending is likely to be in 1986, tighten into a much clearer pattern. Almost two-thirds expect spending to be up, but by no more than 10% compared with 1985. This variation can largely be explained by the much wider range of market situations represented in a typical agency's client roster.

Advertising spending trends

Putting this anticipated rate of spending in the perspective of year-to-year adjustments of the recent past, there's little doubt a pervasive and marked change is in the wind—advertising budgets most likely will be increasing, but at a much slower rate than we've experienced in the past (Table 2).

The majority of advertisers responding—39 out of 75—states that their own company's 1986 spending represents a slowdown (or even decrease) from what they've been doing lately. Yet patterns obviously vary a great deal among these organizations. One out of six clients expects spending to accelerate this year.

Their agency counterparts tend to agree, but here again the consensus view is much tighter. Two-thirds of agency top management, as represented in our Sounding Board, see client media budget growth down or declining.

Underscoring this "braking" effect in action, only one out of ten members of the panel—combining both clients and agencies—sees this year's media dollars growing faster than has been the case in recent years.

Viewed in the broader context of year-to-year record growth in ad dollars and weight during the past decade and more, there's little doubt that 1986 will be a watershed—demonstrating a marked departure in spending philosophy and practice in the business. Whether it's a short-term, one or two-year interruption of historic growth, or the beginning of a major shift in American business' attitude toward promotion expense remains to be seen.

Among those pointing to a significant downturn is William Phillips, ceo, Ogilvy & Mather, New York. He notes that advertising spending is related to sales and that with slower growth due to the economy in general, as well as lower rates of inflation, this means a moderating growth in advertising spending as well.

More specific reasons are advanced for a slowdown or tightening in particular market categories. For instance, William Dowse, vp-advertising of Eastern Air Lines, states, "We made some significant increases in 1985 over 1984 in anticipation of major revenue growth in some key categories. The growth rate did not meet projections. Consequently, we'll show only modest increases in 1986."

Ann Smith, assistant vp-advertising, American Airlines, echoes this view, noting that "1984 was a year in which our ad spending rose about 20%. Thus, with 1985 and 1986 budgets roughly at 'no-growth' levels, when averaged over three years, this puts our spending up about 6% to 7% a year."

Other reasons offered as contributing to expected declines stem from stringent budget-tightening when the client is a government unit, intensifying pressure for improved profit performance from top management and some cold-eyed looks at disappointing financial projections for 1986.

Notes Michael Kirby, director-corporate advertising and promotion, Xerox: "We made significant increases in media budgets in 1985 over 1984 in anticipation of major spending growth in our business category. The growth rate did not meet earlier expectations. We'll consequently show only modest spending increases in 1986."

Other views explained different expectations for different reasons—major increases, an uneven pattern of ups and downs and shifts in spending strategy.

Louis Cardamone, president of MARC & Co., a Pittsburgh-based agency, points to a change in the spending "mix" as the reason behind some of the shifts he spots ahead. "The general trend for our clients' brands is more short-term sales, which may mean greater shifts from pure image media to heavier-weighted promotional events. Over-all, budgets will stay status quo or even increase, but the marketing mix shift may be the most significant factor in 1986."

The advertising director of an automobile importer expects the introduction of vehicles from Korea, Yugoslavia and the U.K. will create greater competition for "share of voice" in his field, so that automotive spending has a good chance of being up significantly this year or soon after.

An executive at a convenience-food company was quite aggressive: "We have the dollars to support our market expansion plans and most of our competitors don't. While we're in robust health relative to our competitors, we want to move ahead as strongly as we possibly can to secure and broaden our consumer franchise."

To some, the pattern is not even across the board, and simple solutions don't apply. Ronald Cox, group vp, Wm. Wrigley Jr. Co., Chicago, states that spending "can vary from year to year depending on marketing opportunities. A blind adherence to a rate of change makes no sense anymore." And Barry Biederman, president of Biederman & Co., New York, notes, "On the whole, budgets are up compared with two or three years ago. But within the over-all pattern there's a good deal of variety."

But whether the trend is up, down or up at a noticeably slower rate, a pervasive change in attitude toward spending seems to be coloring the development of many media budgets right now.

Much of the thinking offered by our panelists in this regard is summed up by Steve Tart of Steve Tart & Associates, a Greenwich, Conn.-based consultancy. "Most advertisers I know are forecasting modest increases in their sales and advertising budgets. But in their guts they're prepared to cut back—and dramatically—if things begin to slip. This is a big change—perhaps a watershed one—in the post-World War II attitude of 'onward-forward-upward.' Nineteen eighty-six will be a year of prudence in media budgeting and exploitation in media buying."

Mr. Tart goes on to say, "The mental state spawned by inflation pricing is long gone. Today the over-all advertiser attitude is to accept a lower rate of increase in profit if there is a corresponding increase in the reliability of making profit goals.

"This attitude is affecting media spending for all brands and programs—from new introductions to brands that are being milked."

Rating the significance of factors in determining ad budgets

Probing more thoroughly into how marketing executives come to grips with advertising spending levels, we asked members of the panel how they felt about the relative importance of many of the different elements which can go into budget planning (Table 3).

For the panel as a whole, the most widely noted single element termed "extremely important" in determining the size of an ad budget is "profit contribution goal or other financial target."

Almost two-thirds of agency management and somewhat more than half of the advertisers termed this requirement crucial in developing the approving advertising budgets.

Beyond this area of agreement, however, client and agency views seem to diverge.

Among advertisers, the next most frequently mentioned point considered "extremely important" (by 40%) is an imminent "change in advertising strategy and/or creative approach." An almost identical number selected "volume or share projections" as of top concern, further emphasizing internal performance and financial matters as preeminent in ad-spending matters.

Still other factors widely considered by clients to be of prime importance in pegging budgets are other aspects of "money mechanics"—"senior management dollar allocation or set limits" and the "level of previous year's spending, with adjustment."

While there is a rough parallel in these patterns on the agency side, there is a noticeable shift of perspective at work. Half of all the agency executives responding consider prior spending levels as extremely important, more so than clients do.

Following close behind, as far as agency executives are concerned, is the matter of using competitive activity or spending levels as a factor in establishing budgets. Some 45% of the agency panel members consider this essentially uncontrollable environmental force an extremely important factor, an emphasis not shared by clients to anywhere near the same degree.

Roughly 40% on the agency side share the client's view that intended changes in advertising strategy or creative approach loom large in spending deliberations.

The AA Editorial Sounding Board

Formed several years ago in answer to a need for a broad-based forum of senior management opinion across the entire range of American marketing and advertising, the Advertising Age Editorial Sounding Board was updated several months ago.

Top-ranked marketing directors and advertising executives from 92 of the 200 largest American advertisers signed on, agreeing to respond to several questionnaires during the year dealing with matters of broad current concern in the business.

They are joined by a representative of top management from 130 of the 200 largest U.S. advertising agencies (in terms of U.S. domestic billings) and 11 prominent consultants active in marketing, communications and advertising strategy work.

The Sounding Board is under the chairmanship of Herbert Zeltner, a consultant in marketing and advertising and frequent contributor to Ad Age.

For the fall, 1985, poll dealing with budgets, productivity and views on the effectiveness of advertising, 75 advertisers, 77 agency representatives and 10 consultants provided comprehensive answers to a detailed 11-point questionnaire. The over-all response, totaling 162, represents 68% of the full group of 237.

concerns about adjusting to cost escalation or adopting necessary strategy changes—are not viewed as crucial in the budget process by either group.

Only 16% of the clients and only 9% of the agency managers see modifications in media as "extremely important" in establishing budgets.

Yet 41% of the advertisers and 43% of the agency managers see it as "somewhat important" in the process.

Several executives volunteered further comment. A few agency heads pointed to the growing popularity of marketing approaches that can provide measurable results.

Henry Eisner, chairman of Eisner & Associates, Baltimore, states, "Some of our major clients are large retailers or direct-response advertisers. Advertising, therefore, is tightly monitored. If the advertising is meeting objectives, the budgets are increased [sometimes rapidly] until the return-on-investment ratio starts to decline."

James Kobs, chairman of Kobs & Brady, Chicago, notes, "There's an ongoing trend to shift budgets from general advertising to areas that are most cost-accountable, like direct marketing and sales promotion."

Shepard Kurnit, chairman of Ephron, Raboy, Tsao & Kurnit New York, sees the budget chal lenge in very pragmatic terms.

"Most of our clients work on 'task' budget—what are we tryin to achieve in terms of share o market, volume increases, stor traffic, etc., and now how much d we have to spend to attain tha goal?"

Establishing an advertisin budget has never been a casua process. However, today, as mos Sounding Board members see it those who pay the bills are in sisting on better proof of wha they can get for their money and more reassurance tha promises will be kept.#

More Sounding Board comment next week.

MacNelly—adman and artist—dies

RICHMOND, VA.—C.L. (Bud) MacNelly, 65, whose career ranged from advertising to publishing, died here Jan. 2. Cause of death was not given.

At one point, Mr. MacNelly served an agency simultaneously as an account and creative executive. He began his career in New York in the 1940s, working at Doherty, Clifford, Steers & Shenfield (merged later to form Needham, Harper & Steers, now Needham Harper Worldwide) and Pedlar & Ryan, long since out of business.

In 1950, he joined Ted Bates Advertising, where he rose to become a senior vp working on the Colgate-Palmolive account.

Mr. MacNelly left Bates in 1962 to become publisher of the Saturday Evening Post, the first person to hold that title in 65 years.

He served there until 1964, when he moved to Norman, Craig & Kummel as an exec vp. Mr. MacNelly then joined Kenyon & Eckhardt as a vp, doubling as management supervisor (on Ford, Nabisco and Pabst Brewing) and a creative director.

He became exec vp at K&E in September, 1965, but left 15 months later to set up a consultancy and become a portrait painter.

Mr. MacNelly's portraits included agency founders such as Bruce Barton (BBDO), Ted Bates and David Ogilvy, as well as Omar Bradley, Jimmy Durante, Joan Fontaine, Barry Goldwater and Billy Graham. His portrait of Rev. Graham appeared in the Post while he was publisher.

Mr. MacNelly's son, Jeffrey, also pursued an art career, becoming a three-time Pulitzer Prize winner for his syndicated editorial cartoons and creating the "Shoe" comics strip.

Despite a career that combined creativity and business, Mr. MacNelly created a stir with a 1966 speech criticizing "creative" ad agencies. The speech was given when the industry's "creative revolution" was at its height and was seen as being aimed at the work then being produced by agencies such as Carl Ally Inc.; Doyle Dane Bernbach; Jack Tinker & Partners, and Wells, Rich, Greene.

The formula for a "creative" agency was to "get a bankrupt client who has no choice but to be permissive, write kooky advertising, get it in The New Yorker and the subway and you'll have a 'creative' agency. Eveyone will run to you and give you business. And they'll never ask how well the product did," he told the audience at a joint magazine seminar sponsored by the the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies, Assn. of National Advertisers and Magazine Advertising Bureau.

"We've done such a miserable job of selling our image to the outside world that we've got to con one another. And we're beginning to believe ourselves," he told the audience, which responded with applause.

The particular ad Mr. MacNelly was taking to task was designed to keep teen agers in school; its headline read "I quit school when I were 15." If the premise is right Mr. MacNelly said, then the youth thinking about dropping out does not know the difference between "was" and "were," and therefore will not get the message.#

BILL VEECK

CHICAGO—Bill Veeck, a promotional genius who would do almost anything to attract and entertain fans of his baseball teams, died here Jan. 2 of cardiac arrest. He was 71.

Mr. Veeck, known as the "Barnum of Baseball," probably will be remembered most for a single stunt: Sending a 3-ft., 7-in. midget named Eddie Gaedel to the plate as a pinch hitter for the St. Louis Browns in 1951. Among the attractions Mr. Veeck introduced to the game were exploding scoreboards and promotions such as ladies' day, bat day and cap day.

He owned three major-league teams in his career: The Cleveland Indians (1946-49), the Browns (1951-53) and the Chicago White Sox twice (1959-61 and 1975-80).#

Grace under pressure

Roy Grace, Doyle Dane Bernbach chairman and executive creative director/U.S., is a 49-year-old overachiever with a fanatical desire to excel. A desire that spills over into every aspect of his life. "I was intense as a kid. It's a challenge to try something I can't do," he explains. "I do everything with great intensity." This intensity has not escaped the notice of his former and current employes at Doyle Dane Bernbach, where it is manifest in an extreme form of competitiveness—Grace against his own staff. Not surprisingly, it is a trait that divides employes into two camps. The "for" lobby sees Grace's methods as inspirational, influential, astute and brilliant. The "against" lobby considers him stubborn, mercurial, intimidating and contemptuous. See Page 4.

Special Report—Tv syndication

The goal of the contest is ratings success. Tv syndicators turn to game shows, situation comedies, dramas, sports programing and other formats to try to reach that goal. Special Report examines the options available in tv syndication—cash and barter, hour and half-hour, first-run and offnetwork—as programers get ready for the National Assn. of Television Program Executives convention this week. Starting on Page 15.

Shasta may hunt new shop

HAYWARD, CAL.—Shasta Beverages may begin looking for a new agency in March, sources say. Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago, resigned the soft-drink marketer's $10 million account after Shasta was acquired by National Beverage Corp., Fort Lauderdale, Fla., from Sara Lee Corp., Chicago (AA, Nov. 11). Also, Shasta director of marketing Rob Cohen has left to take the new post of vp-marketing at Blue Cross of California, Woodland Hills.

FMR loses 'Us'

NEW YORK—Us is moving its $1 million trade account from Fallon McElligott Rice, Minneapolis, following "a mutual parting of the ways," says associate publisher Gregory Dunn. The account moves in-house, pending a creative review next spring. Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, which may be used temporarily to place media, will be included in the review. BJK&E will become a sister company to one of Us' owners, Telepictures Corp., when the latter's merger with Lorimar is completed.

Harris reaches net tv

MELBOURNE, FLA.—Harris Corp. next month will break its first-ever network tv spots, featuring Jerry Stiller and Anne Meara, as part of a $20 million image effort for the company's communication and information processing products (AA, Oct. 14). Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, handles.

Cornish goes to C&W

NEW YORK—Peter Cornish is moving to the top creative tier at Cunningham & Walsh, taking the new post of associate creative director. Mr. Cornish will remain exec vp-creative director at Ketchum Advertising until his successor is found.

Cole leaves Ziff

NEW YORK—David Cole, who joined Ziff Corp. as president-chief operating officer in November, 1984, from chairman-ceo, Ashton-Tate, is leaving to become co-managing partner of the Cole Gilburne Fund. The new venture-capital fund will get major financing from Ziff. Ziff chairman Philip Korsant adds the president title. Also, Ziff Corp. is being renamed Ziff Communications Co., with two divisions: Ziff-Davis Publishing Co. and technical information services.

Sports fights hunger

NEW YORK—Sports will figure in two major sponsored events due this year to raise funds to fight hunger: Sport Aid, due in late spring from Bob Geldof (of Band-Aid and Live Aid fame), and the First Earth Run, developed by New York entrepreneur David Gershon (AA, Oct. 14). Sport Aid will fight African famine. The September-into-December global relay race is patterned after the 1984 Summer Olympics torch relay.

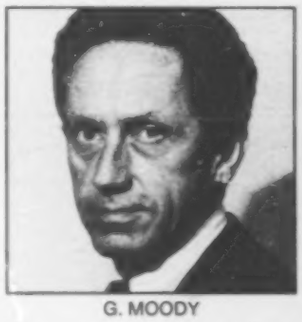
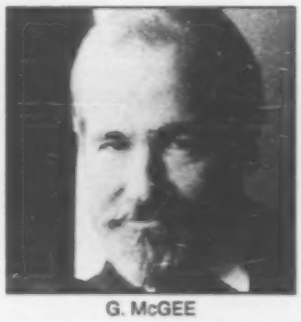
A few years ago agencies felt some pressure to get clients on pay cable channels. Now, pay-per-view movies, sports and specials are the rage. Should advertisers use ppv to break the commercial-free barriers on pay tv?

Gerald Moody, senior vp-director of media, Ross Roy Inc., Detroit: "It isn't a question of whether we should but whether we can. Pay-per-view offers a simple and beautiful advertising opportunity, because you know exactly how many persons contracted for the view, and you can establish a fixed cost-per-1,000 contract. A substantial number of viewers will accept a commercial at the beginning or end of programing, or in the middle if they think it reduces the cost of the programing."



G. MOODY



G. McGEE

Gerald D. McGee, senior vp-managing director, Ogilvy & Mather, Los Angeles: "If I'm buying something, I don't want to be sold, too. I get annoyed if my privacy is invaded, so advertisers could get a negative reaction. Just take a good, hard look at cinema ads and you'll see what happens. But it could be done if the ads are entertaining, don't cut into the programing and are sensitive to the audience."

Bart McHugh, senior vp-director, cable tv, Doyle Dane Bernbach, New York: "When it becomes a viable method of transmitting communications, you're damn right I'll use it. But it's not there yet. I'd rather, and I believe that in our lifetime we will be able to, buy time on the pay networks. Pay universes are still not very big, but they are a proven thing. But what is the pay-per-view universe? I don't want to sound like I only deal in numbers. If ppv carried a program that really made sense for my advertisers, I'd use it."

B. McHUGH

Ronald Kaatz, senior vp-U.S. director of media concepts, J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago: "No-no-no! When everyone was talking about advertising on pay cable movies in the early 1980s, I thought it was a bad idea. This is even worse. There's no way the consumer would pay $4 or $5 for a film with ads when he could get it at his friendly corner taperental store sans blurbs for less. If it was cinema-style advertising at the start of the film it might work, but I wouldn't want to be the first to test the viewer's wrath."

James Dale, vice chairman-corporate creative director, W.B. Doner & Co., Baltimore: "The agency creating advertising for a pay-per-view show would have to be sensitive that the viewer is paying for the programing. Any commercial interruption would have to carry the extra burden of being entertaining. They would be wise to cluster the ads in the British style, in order not to interrupt the programing. It is a contradiction in terms. The viewer is paying for the right to be free of commercials. If the programing is not free, the ads had better be pretty attractive."

Gaining more respect from media buyers

By Marcy Gray Rubin

In the past, syndication has been viewed as broadcasting's stepchild. But current reactions from several ad agencies suggest it is stepping out on its own and now may be one of the biggest contenders for media buyers' attention.

Better quality programing, higher ratings and more sophisticated marketing strategies have increased advertiser interest in syndication spot placement. Clients no longer are looking down their noses at syndication nor hesitating to include it as an element in upfront buying plans.

In addition, the networks' spiraling production costs are encouraging agency participation in programing projects.

If the growth in syndication has any mixed blessing, it is that it will be scrutinized more closely by the ad community and be pressured by the networks. The selling points and pitfalls of each medium will be measured directly against the other's costs, ratings and risks.

Despite syndication being dubbed "this year's hot button in broadcasting" by Wesley Dubin, senior vp, corporate director-network tv and radio, Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago, its success story has been a few years in the making.

Three years ago syndication was a $150 million to $200 million business, says Bill Croasdale, senior vp, director-network tv and programing, BBDO, New York. That number has swelled to its current height of $500 million, and by 1990 it will reach the $1 billon mark, he says.

The networks' 1982-83 15% rate increases initially led agencies to consider syndication, Mr. Croasdale says. Continuously improving station clearances, bigger delivery and greater efficiency keep them coming back, he says. Also, standardized sales practices have legitimized the former ad-hoc approach, says Robert Welty, exec vp, corporate media director, Bozell & Jacobs, New York.

Some media directors indicate syndication's strong growth curve may level off. Richard Kostyra, senior vp, media director, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, says his agency's syndication activity has tapered off following an earlier shift in its favor.

Syndicators seem to believe their success is not because of any passing fancy on advertisers' parts. First-run shows like "Wheel of Fortune" and "Family Feud" pull ratings that compare to network fare, says Dennis Gillespie, senior vp-marketing, Viacom Enteprises, New York. In addition, with the networks putting more support behind made-for-tv movies, he says, syndicators are pulling high ratings by offering film packages after their theatrical and pay cable distribution.

More than programing validity has improved syndication's picture, however, Mr. Gillespie says. Its inroads in children's programing have revolutionized ad revenues for toy manufacturers, he says, and barter has helped offset the costs of first-run programing.

Most media directors agree more ad dollars are being invested in syndication. These bucks are being pulled from network budgets, and not from spot tv, a fact recently documented in an Assn. of National Advertisers report.

Yet upfront buying presents syndicators with a double-edged sword. While scatter buys typically generate more money, syndicators that hold out may face a soft market that helps to fill network coffers instead.

The fourth quarter of 1985 saw this scenario, where the weak market drove network scatter budgets down 15% to 20%, and forced syndication rates down 50%. Both Joel Segal, exec vp, Ted Bates, New York, and Mr. Gillespie say this performance level will continue into the first, second and possibly third quarters, resulting in tough agency spending policies and hard-nosed bargaining.

When evaluating syndication, agencies seek properties that are compatible to the specific marketing requirements of their clients. They may have broad-based or specialized appeal, but the bottom line is to deliver target audiences at lower costs. Traditionally syndication penetration is an estimated 20% to 30% less than network, with a coverage of 70% as opposed to network's 95%, according to most media directors.

Often syndication buys are made when they present a stronger option than conventional programing. For example, Bruce Fein, Bozell & Jacobs' associate director-network negotiation, says one of the agency's clients, a toy manufacturer, enjoys a stronger showing during syndicated after-school animated strips than with network programing. Another client, Lee Co., the Merriam, Kan.-based jeans manufacturer, is ideally suited for the big teen audiences of "Soul Train" and "Hot Tracks," he says, while Ace Hardware Corp., Oak Brook, Ill., does well on syndicated sports shows.

Syndicated shows often fill programing gaps the networks overlook, says Paul Isacson, exec vp, director-broadcast programing and purchasing, Young & Rubicam, New York. He cites programs such as "At the Movies," "Solid Gold" and "Entertainment Tonight," which have no direct network counterparts.

Program timing is another factor. In some time slots, such as early fringe and prime access during weekdays and early fringe on weekends, syndication holds its own. Daytime and late-night continue to be dominated by the networks and many syndicators elect to stay out of these periods, says Mr. Gillespie, pointing to the recent troubles of LBS' Inday block of programing. Stand-alone programing also is a challenge, Mr. Fein says. It is difficult for them to compete with continuous soap lineups, and the costs and time involved can be prohibitive.

Many advertisers tend to feel more comfortable with off-network programs. "M*A*S*H" and "Dallas," which were network blockbusters, tend to attract attention when they go into syndication.

While syndication spot placement has become an advertising staple, the verdict on advertiser-funded programing is still being deliberated. Many say production partnerships are risky and expensive.

"It's a crapshoot, developing a show, clearing it, trying to promise delivery," Mr. Fein says. "Buying an already packaged show lets you predict how it will do based on past performance. If it fails to get ratings, you'll always be paid back."

Agencies cannot just plunk down money and expect to succeed, says BBDO's Mr. Croasdale. "You must do research, get the right property, hire the right production team and have a client who is willing to take the risks with you throughout the long process." He says creative cooperation between BBDO and Multi-Media Productions was the key to success for "Young People's Special," a monthly, half-hour production sponsored by BBDO client Campbell Soup Co., Camden, N.J.

For those companies that might not have the financial muscle to afford coproduction, Richard Coveny, president of New York-based Blair Entertainment, suggests a way advertisers can gain exposure without incurring program sponsorship costs. Clients, such as McCann-Erickson's American Telephone & Telegraph, New York, create commercial lead-ins such as the "Right Choice" syndicated sports spots, which play off the ad's theme.

"We've seen the high cost and frequency of network failures," says Mr. Coveny. "Syndication would enable advertisers to produce at a fraction of the cost and still reap the benefits of creative control."

With audience erosion a fact of broadcasting life, the issue of programing saturation has divided agency and syndication experts into several camps. A growing pool of shows skewed to the same audiences will dilute each program's effectiveness, JWT's Mr. Kostyra says. To prevent this, independent stations should concentrate on building major audiences for fewer shows, he says.

An "explosion in the number of channels and viewer fragmentation won't allow independents to devour each other," Mr. Croasdale says. During the experimental days of ad-supported cable, industry experts discovered that breaking from traditional formats into informational and how-to shows failed to gain audience support, he says. "The bottom line is that viewers want to be entertained. So now syndication, like the networks, is seeking general entertainment vehicles."

Despite this move to network fare, some media directors say syndication will not face an erosion factor. Needham's Mr. Dubin says syndication will suffer no more erosion today than when "audiences were presented with the choice of two radio stations instead of one."

Other influences of network programing could affect syndication's market position. The longer life span of successful network shows added to the smaller number of programs aired may mean the number of offnetwork properties cannot sustain the independent stations. For this reason, syndication's future rests squarely in first-run programing, says Mr. Croasdale.

Shows like "Fame" and "Too Close for Comfort," which have found life after network cancellation, suggest the next step is to bypass the networks entirely. This move may be under way: According to Lawrence Gershman, president MGM/UA Television Group, Los Angeles, syndicators cleared more shows at the NAB convention than the networks.

Syndication's clout may be growing by virtue of the company it is beginning to keep. Acquisitions and joint venture partnerships among station groups, major programing producers and distributors and advertisers and ad agencies are likely to increase as entertainment conglomerates become more vested in marketing and vice versa, says Mr. Gillespie.

Syndicators, such as Mr. Gershman, confirm this suggestion. He directed a recent speech to the Society of Motion Picture & Television Engineers to the topic of profit participation. The trend is exemplified by Lorimar-Telepicture's recent purchase of Kenyon & Eckhardt and Coca-Cola Co.'s takeover of Columbia.

Another possibility is the emergence of a fourth network founded on a base of independent stations. Mr. Gillespie says current network affiliates receive only 5% compensation, compared with syndication's offer of 50%. This may tempt affiliates to leave the networks, he says.

Many media directors say syndication's improved programing quality, bigger budgets and higher ratings, coupled with lower network prices, will narrow any gaps between the two businesses, resulting in a more competitive situation.

With syndication now achieving the recognition from advertisers it has struggled for, how it meets future challenges will determine its staying power.

Marcy Gray Rubin, a New York-based free-lance writer, covered the tv industry as a reporter for Back Stage.

An untitled project that incorporates the talents of director Sidney Lumet and actress Jane Fonda is in the works. Another Lumet film, "Power," starring Richard Gere, will be released in February. "The Boy Who Could Fly" is expected at Easter, and "American Anthem" will take a fling at the summer movie market.

Lorimar's activity in motion pictures has been fairly steady although modestly successful, prompting Mr. Furman to speculate that the company will "revise, revamp and rethink" that area.

Some past projects have been impressive. "Being There" and "An Officer and a Gentleman," which was developed by Lorimar and produced by Paramount, turned in solid box office performances. "The Last Starfighter" has been strong in videocassette release.

A lot will depend on Mr. Rich, who has shown a steady ability for spotting trends and setting precedents—"Dallas" is the granddaddy of prime-time soaps. One of the first miniseries was Lorimar's four-hour "The Blue Knight."

Persistent rumors that Messrs. Rich and Adelson are at odds—one bit of scuttlebutt has Mr. Rich on his way out—probably can be discounted.

"That story has been going around for four or five years," according to aforementioned source. The rumor started when Mr. Rich's ex-wife wanted to dispose of some Lorimar stock, and it reappears every time Mr. Rich approaches a network to make a deal. "Someone always assumes he's making a deal on the side."

Mr. Rich probably is too busy making deals for Lorimar, the company he started in 1969 with Mr. Adelson, after four years as president and executive producer of Mirisch-Rich Productions, which created "Rat Patrol," "Hey Landlord" and the "Pink Panther" tv series. Before that, Mr. Rich spent 14 years with Benton & Bowles in charge of media and programing.

When Lorimar started, Mr. Rich says, it was little more than himself and a secretary. Mr. Adelson was gone most of the time, in those early days, taking care of other business—primarily real estate.

The company's first production was a movie-of-the-week called "The Sporting Club." Mr. Rich unabashedly says it "was a disaster." "The Man," based on the Irving Wallace book of the same name, did somewhat better. It wasn't until another two-hour movie-of-the-week called "The Homecoming" that Lorimar had its first real success.

The program introduced a character called John Boy, and it became "The Waltons" for nine years. Its creator, Earl Hamner, is the idea man behind and current executive producer of "Falcon Crest."

Mr. Rich often is described in Hollywood as having a very short attention span. This characteristic really may be more of a unique ability to shrug off failures as easily as he embraces successes.

Although "Our Family Honor" didn't work this tv season, ABC offered Lorimar a chance to produce nine more episodes, bringing the total to 22. A larger package might have made the show more valuable in rerun and overseas sales, however, Mr. Rich killed it at 13 episodes and decided to convert the nine hours into a commitment for another show with the network.

"It wouldn't be right to continue doing it," he says. "We made those shows as good as we knew how. I think they're good... but the public doesn't like it."

No crying over spilled milk. No wailing over "Our Family Honor" being up against his own "Falcon Crest." There's no such thing as a bad time slot, Mr. Rich says. He learned that long ago, when "The Waltons" started out against Flip Wilson and "The Rookies."

'Newlywed' hopes for long honeymoon

By Kevin Brown

If you could figure out a show called the 'News Lead-in Game Show' you could make $100 million," says Budd Granoff, president of Barris Industries, Los Angeles.

His company's "New Newlywed Game" may not make $100 million—at least not this year—but Mr. Granoff has figured out a formula for success. In its first year of syndication in 1985, the "New Newlywed Game," which cost the company about $2.7 million to produce 175 episodes, may gross $27 million and earn $20 million.

Media directors are calling it the syndication success story of the season. Not bad for a show that almost did not run.

Barris Industries shot a pilot for ABC, which left it standing at the altar for six months. The "New Newlywed Game" pilot was hosted by Jim Lange, instead of Bob Eubanks, who headlined the old "Newlywed Game" from July, 1966, to December, 1974, on ABC. The original show was syndicated from 1977 until 1980, when it was pulled. By the time ABC's option ran out, Mr. Eubanks became available, so Barris edited the old host back into the pilot.

The company sold the show on a cash-barter basis, keeping two 30-second spots. Mr. Granoff says selling the show in 60 or 70 markets would have been good, but selling 163 for the 1985-86 season was great.

Unlike many game shows, "New Newlywed Game" does not pin its success on the size of its purse. The show's prize budget is about $150,000, not much compared to other game shows, Mr. Granoff says.

"Our forte is humor and entertainment," he says. "We like to feel that our shows can operate like a sitcom, as opposed to skill and knowledge shows."

The formula seems to have worked. "New Newlywed" is pulling a 9.2 share (percentage of tv sets in use) nationally, and Barris is projecting revenues of $42 million in 1986.

"This show is one that you can't help but watch because it's so funny," says Barbara Welsh, vp-director account service at Botway/Libov's Chicago office. Botway, the largest media buying service in the country, according to Ms. Welsh, likes the "New Newlywed Game" because it offers good cost per thousand and a good reach factor for women 18 to 34 years old.

Barris already is selling another reincarnation: "We Love the Dating Game." "They're honing them down, making them faster, perfecting them," Ms. Welsh says of the two shows. Part of the formula is that these are shows to which people can relate, she says. "They see themselves up there."

Barris Industries expects a lot of people to identify with its reincarnated dating game. The company projects the program will gross $30 million in 1986.

"We are the only game show that's a firm go for 1986," Mr. Granoff says. "Dating" has sold in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, San Francisco and Philadelphia at a cost to the company of $3 million for 175 episodes.

In some markets, such as Baltimore, "Newlywed" has surpassed game show leader "Wheel of Fortune," Mr. Granoff says.

"We're clipping away at 'Wheel of Fortune,' " he says. "We've found early fringe has become so critical to stations' local news that they're willing to pay high prices for afternoon shows, sometime comparable to [prime time] access."

Barris Industries' "New Newlywed Game" is bring riches to more than just contestants. The show may have earned more than $20 million in 1985.

Next week Advertising Age's Special Report will focus on Newspapers.

ON THE DIAL

A weekly listing of tv programming that still has commercial availabilities open in the next few weeks.

"NFL Update '86," a one-time-only special produced by Blair Entertainment, New York, is being sold at $20,000 per 30-second spot. The one-hour show will be broadcast on or before Labor Day this year. Station clearance has not yet been completed but Blair is guaranteeing advertisers a 4 to 5 national household rating. The show features prominent players, coaches and games of the previous year.

"Road to Super Bowl '87," next year's version of the annual program, is already on the market from Blair Entertainment. The 1986 broadcast has already been sold out. The show, which chronicles the campaigns to the SB, will be broadcast from 7 p.m. to 8 p.m. the night before Super Bowl XXI. Last year the show achieved an 8.6 rating; Blair is guaranteeing advertisers an 11 to 12 rating for the '87 show. Pricing has not yet been set.

"Break the Bank" and "Divorce Court" each have avails through Jan. 24. Orbis Communications, New York, is handling the barter sales. Avails on "Break the Bank" are priced from $7,000 to $7,500 per 30 seconds; on "Divorce Court" a 30 is priced at $15,000. "Court" has a 91% national coverage on 132 stations and averages a 5.5 to a 6 rating. "Break the Bank" has a 61% national coverage on 54 stations and achieves under a 3 rating. Both shows are guaranteed on a cash-back basis.

"Wall Street Journal Report," the weekly financial news show produced by Dow Jones & Co., New York, and based on the Wall Street Journal, has avails during the last week of February and all of March. Thirty-second units are priced at $8,500. Cleared on 88 stations in 75 markets, the half-hour show has been averaging just less than a 2 rating.

"Ireland and the Irish" is a one-hour special on the people, music, language, sport and history of Ireland set for broadcast the weekend of March 14 to 16, just before St. Patrick's Day. ProServ Television, Dallas, is producing and handling sales. Price for a 30-second spot is $20,000, with a 4 audience rating guarantee. Advertisers already in include Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser and Aer Lingus. Flutist James Galway hosts. The producer is guaranteeing at least 65% U.S. household clearances by airdate.

"A Hard Road to Glory" is a one-hour special on the history of the black American athlete set for broadcast during Black History Month in February. ProServ, Dallas, is producing and handling sales. Asking price for a 30-second spot is $20,000 with a 4 audience rating guarantee. Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser, Nike and McDonald's are already in the show as sponsors. Arthur Ashe, the former tennis star, is the host and actor James Earl Jones is the narrator. Lou Rawls handles the theme song. The show has cleared seven of the top 10 markets; the producer guarantees 75% coverage by airdate. ■

Scheduled radio specials and new programs or syndicated services.

"Profile '86," starts the weekend of Jan. 24 to 26 with Canadian supergroup "Loverboy." It is a new 90-minute monthly series featuring the latest music and up-to-the-minute interviews with rock's million-selling performers. Syndicated by NBC Radio Entertainment, "Profile '86" is produced by Torus Communications and hosted by Dan Neer, a New York disc jockey. Anheuser-Busch, St. Louis, is already in the show.

"Live From the Apollo" is a monthly, one-hour rhythm & blues show live from Harlem's historic Apollo Theatre. Its debut is Jan. 25. Eugene Wild, whose "Don't Say No Tonight" album has topped the black/urban record charts, is the first star. B.K. Kirkland of WBLS (fm), New York, is the show host. The pro-

TV POWER SHARES

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decidedly a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

The power of NBC's prime time line up becomes increasingly obvious every week. Of the 28 time periods during the week ending Jan. 9, NBC won 13, including six of the top 10 dominant shows and 12 of the top 20 winners. CBS had nine time period winners, but four of those were borderline victors and only stalwarts 60 Minutes and Dallas had impressive wins. ABC won only six time slots, and if the network can make a turnaround, its going to be known as the Tony Danza network. Who's the Boss moved up from the good winner category to a dominant victor, and is a certified megahit. The show is also tracking upward. Watch for Boss to keep on getting stronger —it's part of the new theme that good writing is the key to ratings success, and Who's the Boss has some of the best writing on tv. Golden Girls continues to show strong shares, moving up from 9th place last week to finish fourth in a very competitive week for regular series head-to-head competition. The folks at Disney, who hold the Girls' syndication rights, can expect a gold mine a few years from now. Highway to Heaven came back strong after a week's hiatus and posted strong shares. Cheers had one of its most dominant weeks ever and continues to gain strength. Patience, as Mr. Tartikoff knows, is a virtue and a half. 227 can't hold Golden Girls' lead-in shares, but it is tracking upward every week and seems to be getting its own legs and is close to becoming the true sleeper hit of the year. Miami Vice had one of its weakest victories of the season, dropping from eighth place last week to 16th. That was the first show after Tartikoff revealed the letters of protest received from former Vice fanatics. No wonder the NBC wonder boy said he was misquoted. Kate & Allie won for the second week in a row, but it did not do nearly as well against regular series as it did against a grade "b" college bowl game. NBC looks to have another potential hit on its hands with Blacke's Magic. The pilot special won its time period and the first regular episode took Dynasty down to its weakest win of the season. A Time To Triumph was the first CBS Tuesday Night Movie in a month to win its time slot, and that one—with Patty Duke Austin getting a job after her husband gets laid off—only won part of its second hour.

HIGHLIGHTS

Nielsen gets challenge 1
The battle for dominance in marketing research intensifies as the research subsidiaries of Time Inc. and Control Data Corp. merge their resources to challenge the A.C. Nielsen Co. unit of Dun & Bradstreet.

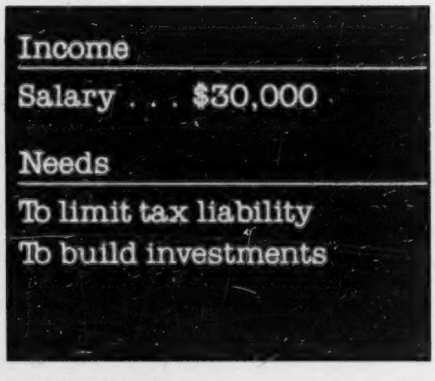
Bay's rise was rocky 1
Hal Bay, who has resigned as president of D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, came to power as a compromise, the only viable candidate in a bitter battle between two agencies—D'Arcy-MacManus International and Masius, Wynne-Williams—that had merged more in name than in spirit. First of a series.

Creation of a media monster 3
When it comes to advertising, it is the mind-boggling $1.1 million minute for Super Bowl XX that people talk about. It's become as much of a phenomenon as the game itself—the most expensive minute in tv advertising. But how did the Super Bowl become such a big event? The men who created the game will tell you the Super Bowl just kind of happened.

Here comes Hyundai 3
Hyundai Motor America this month drives into the U.S. with a three-week teaser campaign designed to introduce both the South Korean company and its first car designed for the U.S.

Sweet inspiration 27
The sugar industry will sweeten its advertising pot this year, adding $1 million to its ad budget and using tv spots for the first time. Also being considered is a sugar "designer label" for food-product marketers that use the real thing.

In the swim 33
Ujena Co. hopes to broaden awareness of its mail-order swimsuits with Swimwear Illustrated, wrapping a slick editorial format around the company's catalog. Buoyed by the success of Sports Illustrated's annual swimsuit issue, Ujena sees Swimwear, which features only Ujena swimwear, both as a means of increasing sales and a potential winner at newsstands.



Reality theater 42
John Hancock Financial Services' new "Real life, real answers" campaign by Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston, most definitely breaks through the clutter. In fact, it just about grabs you by the neck and shakes you: "Real life, real answers, DAMN IT!" A review by Bob Garfield.

Taking chances 66
Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt's resignation of the $10 million-to-$12 million Prudential-Bache account in order to compete for $40 million in Merrill Lynch business (AA, Jan. 9) is the best illustration to date of why Bozell & Jacobs decided to merge with Kenyon & Eckhardt—a greater capacity to take risks.

Triangle whips up 'Good Food' 67
Triangle Communications' top executives remain optimistic about this week's reintroduction of Good Food, despite an unenthusiastic response so far from advertisers. Said group publisher Frank Wolf, Walter Annenberg, chairman, parent Triangle Publications, "tells me, and tells everyone, he doesn't expect to fail. And given the adequate amount of time, I don't see how we can."

Auto media spending on rise 69
Heightened competition in the U.S. car and truck market is likely to drive total new-vehicle media spending to $6 billion this year, a top auto executive predicts.

CORPORATE CLOSEUP

Thompson's on the spot 4
Thompson Medical Co., the company that makes its money by helping thousands of Americans lose weight, was forced onto a corporate diet itself last year. Competition heated up in Thompson's biggest category, appetite suppressants, and the bottom fell out of its second-largest, meal replacements.

NEW PRODUCTS

Innovations, yes; technology, no 35
While marketers are coming up with record numbers of new food and beverage products, the innovations are coming in areas they know best—positioning and formula—rather than from any new technology.

INTERNATIONAL

Hugo's hot 40

Chinese ad crackdown 40
The Chinese government is taking steps to regulate the advertising industry, which has grown substantially since major reforms were introduced in 1979 that opened the door for western-style marketing.

Little dabs still do it 41
Beecham Products' Brylcreem is making a comeback in the U.K. with an ad campaign via Grey Ltd., London, that uses segments of old, b&w U.S. spots.

Although negotiations between Estee Lauder and Giorgio for Lauder's purchase of the $110 million fragrance company broke off last week, it's clear Lauder is no longer content with being a one-star company. Page 71.

COMING THURSDAY

Philip Guarascio holds a coveted corner office in Detroit's General Motors building, a privilege usually reserved for people who have made automobiles and GM their lives. Guarascio is an outsider, recruited from the agency business to become executive director for advertising services on GM's marketing and product planning staff. He oversees GM's $1 billion a year ad and promotional budget from a position that didn't exist before he filled it.

Special Report: Niche, product development and target audience are all part of the vocabulary of newspaper executives as marketing becomes an important part of the business.

Shasta shakeup has it fizzling

By BRIAN LOWRY

HAYWARD, CAL.—Shasta Beverages appears to be in disarray following its acquisition by National Beverage Corp. from Sara Lee Corp.

The eight-person marketing staff has left the soft-drink company during the last two months, and members of the executive committee and sales force seem likely to follow, a former Shasta executive predicted.

Notable among those leaving is director of marketing Rob Cohen, who took the title of vp-marketing at Blue Cross of California, Woodland Hills (AA, Jan. 16). Shasta sales manager Truitt Crenshaw is overseeing marketing on an interim basis.

After teasers, Hyundai set to 'make sense'

By CLEVELAND HORTON

GARDEN GROVE, CAL.—Hyundai Motor America later this month drives into the U.S. market with a three-week teaser campaign designed to introduce both the company and its first car designed for the U.S.

The teaser-corporate campaign is designed to pique the interest of the car-buying public before the Excel goes on sale Feb. 15.

The new U.S. importer is a subsidiary of the giant South Korean conglomerate Hyundai Corp., and the campaign will focus on the company's heritage, specifically its ranking in the ship-building and locomotive manufacturing industries.

The ads point out that Hyundai Corp., with annual sales of about $11 billion, is the 39th-largest corporation in the world.

Print ads, accompanying the company's current participation in the national auto show circuit, use the headline: "Its father was a locomotive. Its mother was a ship." The first advertising also will stress Hyundai's success in Canada, where the company became the leading automotive importer after only two years.

Not the least of Hyundai's problems is its name, which to westerners can look impossible to pronounce. It will try to make that task easier on the western world with an explanation in copy that Hyundai rhymes with Sunday.

The first tv commercials keep the Excel under wraps. They show the cars loaded on a carrier truck, each carefully cloaked in what appears to be a tarpaulin.

As the kickoff date approaches, Hyundai will remove the covers from the car. Once the car begins selling, Hyundai will substitute more traditional product advertising while retaining the theme line "Hyundai. Cars that make sense."

The Super Bowl: Two decades in the spotlight

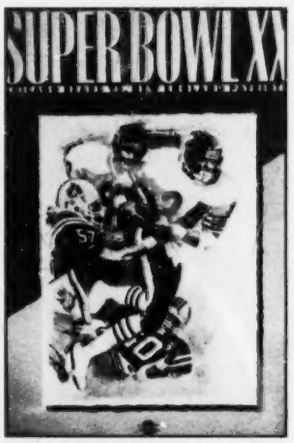
By ROBERT RAISSMAN

Vince Lombardi paced the sidelines, champing at the bit.

His Green Bay Packers were on the way to defeating the Kansas City Chiefs in Super Bowl I, erasing any doubt about whether the National Football League was superior to the American Football League.

The second-half kickoff was drilled deep into Kansas City territory. Referees' whistles started blowing. There was confusion—no penalty flags had been thrown, but the zebras were bringing the ball back. Mr. Lombardi was doing his version of the Ubangi stomp on the sidelines.

Only Bill Creassy, a CBS producer handling the pool feed for both CBS and NBC, knew what was happening. A Winston cigaret commercial running on NBC had delayed the start of the kickoff. With 13 seconds left in the commercial, the officials decided to start the second half. NBC cut from the spot and picked up the action. Tv viewers saw the ball hitting the ground and the referees whistling it dead. When the refs began running the ball back, viewers were told the kickoff was being repeated because the game clock had not started and Mr. Lombardi's Packers had jumped the gun.



Circle Fine Art, Chicago, last week rushed this NFL-licensed poster to market.

Bill McPhail, CBS vp in charge of sports, said both NBC and CBS had been warned to cut first-half replays short and to get into the commercial fast.

NBC engineers missed the cue on that day 20 years ago, writing the first chapter of the Super Bowl advertising phenomenon.

When it comes to advertising, it is the mind-boggling $1.1 million minute for Super Bowl XX that people talk about. It's become as much of a phenomenon as the game itself—the most expensive minute in tv advertising.

But how did the Super Bowl become such a big event? Was there a concerted marketing effort behind it? The men who created the game say no.

They will tell you the Super Bowl just kind of happened.

"We sold the television rights to the 1960-61 NFL Championship Game to CBS for $600,000," said NFL commissioner Pete Rozelle. "That was before the merger [between the AFL and NFL]. I thought it was a lot of money, but I could never foresee advertisers ever paying a million for a minute."

In 1969, Super Bowl III set the price for future advertisers. The New York Jets, the AFL underdogs led by brash Joe Willie Namath, defeated the heavily favored Baltimore Colts, 16-7. The price of a minute skyrocketed from $85,000 to $200,000 for Super Bowl IV the next year.

Not only was there a lot at stake for the Jets, there was also a lot riding on the game for NBC, the network that telecast AFL games. In 1965, NBC had bailed out the AFL by paying $36 million for tv rights. The network stipulated that much of the Strategy, creative shaping ad budgets

Competition, spending also keys

This is the second of two articles on the ADVERTISING AGE Sounding Board outlook for advertising in 1986. The first article ran Jan. 13.

By HERBERT ZELTNER

Attempting to put the budget-planning process into the perspective of change over time, we asked members of the ADVERTISING AGE Editorial Sounding Board which of a variety of forces and measurements were gaining—and which were losing—in importance in their thinking when advertising budgets were being determined (Table 4).

More than half the client-side executives who responded noted impending changes in advertising strategy, or modifications in creative approach, are taking on increasing importance in their budget thinking. Close to half (47%) also stated that competitive activity and spending levels were becoming more significant. Yet the very practical matter of profit contribution goals or other financial targets—already named as the most important single factor by more than half the group—is gaining.

More than half the agency respondents (56%) also singled out financial targets and profit contribution as growing in importance in client budget thinking.

Agency executives also believe a greater regard for competitive activity is occurring in budget strategy work and that changes in strategy will take on added significance as well.

On the other hand, a good number of marketing executives sense that adjustments to the previous year's budget level will be decreasing in importance as a factor in budget making. Agency participants broaden the list of factors lessening in significance—25% of them stating that media cost projections and working from last year's spending levels will take on less prominence in client thinking.

Industrywide spending

On the broader subject of national advertising in general, we asked members of our Sounding Board how they personally felt about advertising spending

CORPORATE CLOSEUP

Thompson Medical hungry for new markets

By NANCY GIGES

Thompson Medical Co., the company that makes its money by helping thousands of Americans lose weight, was forced onto a corporate diet itself last year. Competition heated up in Thompson's biggest category, appetite suppressants, and the bottom fell out of its second-largest, meal replacements.

When final figures are calculated, sales for the year ended Nov. 30 may be more than 30% below those of the previous year. Earnings may fall 40%.

But executives at New York-based Thompson point out that '84 was a record year, primarily due to a $50 million increase in Slim-Fast meal replacement sales. Thompson says it never expected to beat those figures a year later.

"We're a 'seize the moment' kind of company," said Ronnie Stern, vp-marketing. "We don't manage our sales and earnings. We don't hold back new products nor push them ahead to make our income statement look good."

That's why a graph of Thompson sales and earnings zigs and zags, reflecting spurts of growth when the company takes advantage of opportunities. This past year's nose dive, however, was more than Thompson anticipated, as unit volumes fell in its two key categories.

Sales are estimated at $140 million for fiscal '85, down from the $197.2 million reported a year ago. Earnings are estimated at $12 million, down from $21.1 million. Analysts say both figures will bounce back this fiscal year, but not quite to the record levels of '84.

True to its philosophy of "seize the moment," Thompson does not spend a lot of time and money on sophisticated market research. It prefers to send its marketing executives out to talk directly to the food and drug trades and, especially, to consumers. The company then puts products in the marketplace and lets the consumer decide.

Typically, Thompson breaks advertising as soon as a product gains good distribution. And it spends heavily. Its advertising/sales ratio is more than double the drug-industry average.

For '84, the company reported spending $52.8 million, a figure equivalent to 27% of sales, compared with an industry average of 11%. Even with sales slumping last year, Thompson did not cut back proportionately; sources estimate ad spending at $44 million, representing an estimated 31% of sales.

All that money goes through one agency, Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, New York, a shop that convinced Thompson of its worth several years ago by suggesting the company use testimonials for its Dexatrim appetite suppressant.

Accustomed to handling most of its functions in-house, Thompson was experimenting with using outside agencies in 1979 by asking several to come up with concepts. Just before a new active ingredient for Dexatrim was approved by the Food & Drug Administration, Thompson and one of the agencies produced a spot with the product as hero.

"We all hated it," said Mr. Stern, "but we knew approval would come any day." Then Thompson marketing executives wound up talking to the Compton agency (now part of Saatchi), which told them of the "gold" they had in testimonial letters from consumers. The rest is history.

Thompson is so loyal to Saatchi that even when the agency is blocked from handling a particular product (such as Decongest, because Saatchi handles Johnson & Johnson's Co-Tylenol), it uses another member of the Saatchi family. Decongest, originally handled by Saatchi's healthcare subsidiary, Klemtner Advertising, has found a permanent home with Fairfax Advertising, Saatchi's direct-marketing subsidiary.

Decongest is Thompson's first entry in the huge cough/cold remedy category, and the company's strategy with that product typifies its approach to advertising. Planning to roll out across the country this winter, Thompson gained such good distribution quickly in Chicago, Charlotte, N.C., and Milwaukee that it made spot buys in those markets to precede its network program.

Decongest also represents the first of a hoped-for string of new products that will reduce Thompson's dependence on diet aids, businesses that represented 86% of the company's sales in '84. "Our hope is to enter a new [over-the-counter] category each year," Mr. Stern said. "We want to broaden our base to become a major factor in every [health & beauty aid] category out there."

Those are ambitious objectives, but Mr. Stern points to the company's track record: "When I joined Thompson 10 years ago, we were doing about $18 million in sales, and only 5% was nondiet aids. Last year sales were near $200 million."

While the company's first product was not a diet aid, those brands established a firm foundation. Thompson's origins can be traced to 1947 when the current chair-

Court limits Thompson, Ciba

New York—Thompson Medical's fight with Ciba-Geigy to hold onto the Dexatrim market share has resulted in a court order preventing both companies from shipping certain products until they provide adequate substantiation.

Ciba-Geigy, Summit, N.J., also has been enjoined from making claims of therapeutic advantage or superiority for Acutrim over Thompson's extra-strength Dexatrim or any other appetite suppressant with phenylpropanolamine.

Both companies claimed victory after the federal court order this month, but neither can ship line extensions that were added to enable them to make longer-lasting claims. The products involved are Thompson's Dexatrim-15, which made a 15-hour claim, and Ciba's Acutrim II, which made a 17-hour claim. Regular Dexatrim makes a 12-hour claim and Acutrim makes a 16-hour claim.

The complicated order prevents Ciba from using comparative advertising for regular Acutrim unless the company presents additional clinical studies that support claims of therapeutic advantage or superiority. Ally & Gargano, New York, handles Acutrim; Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, New York, handles Dexatrim.—N.G.

Beer marketers barreling toward market-share fight

By SCOTT HUME and RAY SERAFIN

After a year of new-product rollouts, new national advertising campaigns and competitive repositionings, the nation's brewers are down to arm wrestling for market share.

Total domestic-beer shipments in 1985 increased less than 1%, the fourth consecutive year to yield no significant gain. More importantly, 1985 saw brewers develop product lineups and marketing plans in which flat sales are status quo.

A stagnant or shrinking market is being treated as the new reality of the industry, rather than a short-term problem soon to be reversed, and brewers' 1986 game plans will channel resources toward grabbing larger shares. Analysts expect a rough fight.

"The level of competitive activity is going to be high, but it's going to be more localized," said Manny Goldman, analyst at Montgomery Securities, San Francisco. Brewers have spent the past 18 months polishing or revising their national images to set the stage for a shift in direction this year, he said. "Now I look for the focus to be on particular markets, and submarkets within those markets, to gain over-all in 1986 (see Table 5).

The most widely held view on both sides is that budgets will be slowing down in their rate of growth. Just about four out of ten see this braking effect taking hold. Somewhat more than a third believe that 1986 will be up in dollars by a bit, by merely staying even with modest levels of inflation.

Agency executives are much more inclined to a mixed view—that whatever pattern develops will be the result of varying rates of change among different categories. Almost a fifth of the agency officers answering held to this view.

Only 6% of the full panel held to the upbeat view that advertising spending would be up again, sharply, this year.

Many acknowledge that ad spending trends have varied widely from category to category, based on different situations regarding competition, traditional advertising-to-sales ratios, opportunity, profits, corporate health and a host of other factors.

More than half the Sounding Board expects that advertising in support of consumer financial services will continue to grow rapidly. Other candidates for faster-than-average gain include fast-food entries, communications and entertainment and soft-drink brands.

On the other hand, some long-established categories are expected to decline in relative importance. Almost a third of the panel expects a significant drop in tobacco and liquor advertising. Large numbers of respondents also sense that budgets will be tightening for brands in the chemicals, gasoline, electronics and office-equipment areas.

Clients tend to be more bullish about faster advertising dollar growth in the automobile category than is true of our agency participants. They also are more optimistic spending will hold up for chemicals and gasoline.

On the agency side, opinions are considerably more optimistic for major new spending growth in both pharmaceuticals and among retail chains.

Tom Purcell, corporate director of advertising and marketing services, Geo. A. Hormel & Co., Austin, Minn., observed that flux and change is normal and expectable: "The economy is such a mixed bag. I feel some parts are 'consolidating,' some 'reassessing,' some moving full-bore. Consumer income and life styles will continue to crown new heroes and dethrone old kings."

Victor Galef, vp-marketing, SmithKline Beckman Corp., Philadelphia, notes unusual uncertainty, which clouds the outlook: "Economic trends are not yet clear, and I believe product advertisers will take more of a 'wait and see' attitude before committing increased spending over inflationary rates."

Michael Kirby of Xerox agrees and adds that major mergers by big advertisers will generate higher discount levels for more brands, thus holding down the rate increase somewhat.

Agency panelists citing the air of certainty included R.W. Fletcher, chairman of Fletcher/Mayo Associates, St. Joseph, Mo., who said, "The past 12 months have shaken our confidence in our ability to forecast anywhere near as accurately as in the past." Adds Patrick J. McGrath, president of Jordan, Case, Taylor & McGrath, New York, "Caution seems to be making a comeback across business in general."

William Weilbacher, head of Bismark Corp.—a New York-based marketing and advertising consultancy—suggests a deep-seated cause which could affect planning quite broadly. "Advertisers are getting very nervous about advertising expenditure levels. Some are beginning to ask, 'Could we be spending too much?' This question will be asked more frequently in 1986."

On the creative front

We asked the client members of the Sounding Board whether, in light of tight ad budgets, they were working at ways to increase the productivity of creative efforts. We also asked agency members whether they saw moves along these lines among their clients.

An overwhelming 83% of the client participants said yes, they were now involved in the development and testing of new creative strategies for established brands. Another 10% volunteered that they planned to take such action.

Confirmation that a great deal of effort is under way on the creative front comes from the agency side, where 79% of the agency executives polled see more activity than ever, with both clients and agencies.

Three out of four clients also tell us they're considering or evaluating special efforts against specific market segments or new target areas. And 85% of the agency managers responding agree that there's more action now in probing for new niches for established products.

The search also goes on in reassessing brand attributes to find new uses or applications for products; 60% of the clients and 70% of the agency respondents tell us work along these lines is under way.

Still another aspect of the search for better ways to handle creative has to do with using new creative units (15-second spots in broadcast, fractional space in print) and experimenting with quite different media formats. That plenty is going on here, too, is evident when 76% of the marketers and 71% of the agency heads mention action of this type.

In this search for greater effectiveness, clients are looking around for new sources of talent, both within their own organizations and agencies or even outside. Just about one-third of the clients responding state they are augmenting or tapping into added creative resources within their companies or getting new teams at their agencies assigned. A significant minority (17%) say they are scouting for and appointing entirely new creative resources—other agencies or special outside talent units.

The agency community senses this restlessness; 45% of the agency executives acknowledge their clients are seeking additional creative resources, and one out of four is aware that clients are looking outside present affiliations for new talent and approaches.

We asked clients how effective they thought these various moves might be. John Porter, vp-marketing and sales, Dole Processed Foods (Castle & Cooke), notes that "special efforts against [particular] market segments are potentially our most cost-effective marketing program."

We asked the agency members of the Sounding Board whether they saw any shift in who is taking the initiative in these creative changes—client or agency? Quite a few noted that agencies were taking the lead—or certainly should as a fundamental part of their assigned responsibility.

Yet a good number also commented that clients seem to be getting a great deal more active in initiating or urging their agencies to undertake new moves designed to improve the selling power of creative efforts.

Media planning and buying

Media planning and buying is a fruitful area for change and improvement as the hunt for "budget enhancers" intensifies, according to members of the Sounding Board. As with creative and budget planning, action seems under way among advertisers and agencies.

The most widespread area of attention on the media front, according to the Sounding Board, has to do with more sophisticated data and analysis techniques that relate prospect profiles to demographics and to media audiences.

Three-fourths of the clients note they are active in this type of work and three out of four agency managers state their media departments are more active than ever in study and analysis of this type.

Two-thirds of the clients also tell us they're using or testing different media forms. References here include the integration of direct-mail campaigns with more traditional broadcast and print forms; the inclusion of Yellow Pages directory advertising as a selling medium; the addition of tightly focused cable tv schedules to augment wider tv efforts, and use of entirely new approaches to out-of-home availabilities in key urban locations. And 73% of our agency participants say they are more involved than ever in this broadening out of media efforts to less traditional approaches.

But this battle for greater media effectiveness exists among the standard media categories as well. More than six out of ten company ad executives state they are involved in altering their usual media mix. Close to half of the agency panel—48%—see the same thing happening with media plans developed within their agencies.

A very new development in media planning and buying is, of course, the growing availability of 15-second announcements in tv. More than two-thirds of the agency segment (68%) tell us that they already are considering or using these new commercial lengths—a point echoed on the client side, where almost half the advertisers (48%) already are making this adjustment.

More than half the clients (57%) also note they are shifting the balance between national and local media components, apparently as a result of improved skills in adjusting advertising weight geographically. Agency management also spots this trend, but some less broadly (41%).

Significant minorities—anywhere from one-third to 45% of both groups—point to other moves, such as adjusting daypart mixes in broadcast and modifying the timing of media schedules, either by tightening up seasonal efforts or using in-and-out patterns more aggressively.

A particularly revealing clue to how widespread and insistent the search is becoming for improvements in media productivity comes from the fact 50 of the top agency executives queries—three-quarters of the entire group—tell us that their clients are becoming much more involved in media matters and at much more senior levels.

A top movie industry marketing executive said his department and agency are adjusting advertising plans for each feature film distributed to focus on who they know will be best prospects.

Robert Lauterborn, director-marketing communications and corporate advertising, International Paper Co., believes "a tighter focus on smaller segments" will be particularly effective in his company.

Words of wisdom

A sample of views from members of the Advertising Age Sounding Board on what to do to strengthen the effectiveness of advertising. The question: "What suggestions would you offer to fellow advertisers and agencies to improve productivity in our field?"

Advertisers should become more involved with the media and creative process. Independent analysis—then joint decision—make for more effective and efficient use of advertising dollars. Christopher Wackman, Subaru of America.

Work hard, be open-minded, be focused and creatively take no prisoners! Patrick Fallon, president, Fallon McElligott Rice.

Proceed cautiously as you consider "new" media options/mixes. Continue to pressure the agency and the media source for more audience information—and don't hesitate to experiment, but where possible take steps to make it a true learning experience with measurable results. Joseph Kelsch, senior vp-marketing, American Dairy Assn.

Greater reliance on upfront (i.e., strategic) research, less on copy testing. Better pinpointed strategies, better creative product. Edward Wax, president, Saatchi & Saatchi Compton.

1. Involve fewer and more senior people in decision-making process at both agency and client company.

2. Greater focus on alternatives to network tv in particular and, in general, a more creative approach to media planning.

3. Less "mass-market" approach, more segmented "target-market" thinking in strategy development and execution. R.A. Costello, manager-corporate brand communications, General Electric.

Get out of the box. Manage risk to breakthrough—particularly in television. In print—be patient; it takes much longer than we want to admit. Hans Stern, director-Brown-Forman Media Services, Brown-Forman Corp.

Defend your large, broad-based buys that are capturing 50% of your target bases. They need your support and dollars if they are going to survive. You'll pay big when they're gone. And we could see them collapse in five years. Robert Miller, president, Miller Meester Advertising.

Get rid of layers—have fewer decision-makers. Get key people to write the copy and key people to agree on it. Would David Ogilvy have done away with the seven layers of brand management? Cream can't rise to the top if it's filtered in cotton balls! Henry Kornhauser, ceo, Kornhauser & Calene.

Get more entertainment value into advertising. Experiment with new and unique media vehicles. Do more/better testing of strategy before writing advertising. H.M. Baum, president-U.S. division, Campbell Soup Co.

In order for advertising to be effective, the first consideration is that it needs to be arresting. The second consideration is that it should be intellectually and emotionally rewarding; people give the advertiser their undivided attention and in exchange they receive a reward. This reward is in the form of a smile or laugh, a piece of information, or a conscious involvement with the ad that establishes rapport with the advertiser. Effective advertising is created by an informed group of people who know why the product or service is a good buy; know what the product or service offers; know what kinds of people are good prospects, and know why they should want the product or service. Stan Richards, principal, Richards Group.

Be willing to invest in consumer research prior to strategy development. Avoid highly visible media unless they really fit product needs. Be willing to reach the consumer in little bits and pieces, which is more complex and time-consuming, but critical to future marketing. John Porter, vp-marketing and sales, Dole Processed Foods, Castle & Cooke.

A point of view offered by William Claggett, vp, Ralston Purina Co., touches on many issues raised in this poll.

How the business outlook for 1986 affects the management of the media function:

Many advertisers tell us 1986 will be a year in which sharper focus will be placed upon increased productivity in all areas. Since advertising is usually the biggest variable in large advertisers' budgets, it stands to reason that emphasis will be placed upon making the most effective possible media purchases, attempting to hold down tv production costs and making sure that agency commissions and fees should be targeted against the most productive assignments.

The sudden rash of megamergers in the communications industry will result in the very biggest agencies having more buying clout, commercial piggybacking opportunities, media resources and budget flexibility than ever before. This may put medium-size agencies and independent large advertisers at a disadvantage, so they're going to have to do everything possible to stretch out their dollars. In many cases this will result in increased efforts to examine media alternatives to network television, more emphasis on tv production costs, a more widespread use of 15-second commercial lengths and the investigation of new media combinations. It seems to me that alert advertisers can achieve their objectives, but they will have to pay more careful attention to all of these cost areas and be willing to examine a wider range of options.#

emergence of 15-second announcements as offering new opportunities for major improvements in efficiency.

Xerox's Michael Kirby urges the industry to "curb the use of 15-second commercials which will contribute to clutter and potentially reduce effectiveness." Yet some feel economic forces are working for greater availability of the new unit. Noted Victor Galef of SmithKline Beckman: "The trend to 15 seconds will increase in tv and will bring smaller brands, which can't currently afford tv, back to the medium."

Balance of ads and promotion

To improve short-term sales results, many consumer-goods marketers shift funds from advertising to promotion. Traditional thinking holds that media advertising works longer-term, building awareness and favorable attitudes in order to strengthen brand franchises for the future. Merchandising and promotion efforts, on the other hand, are expected to give an immediate and measurable boost to volume.

In our panel, somewhat more than a third (35%) of our advertiser panelists stated they were moving more money into promotion—and presumably taking it away from media efforts—in their 1986 planning. But there apparently is a great deal of contrary motion as well—another 20% tells us that budgets are shifting the other way from promotion into media. For close to half the clients who responded, no significant alteration in either direction is being made now.

On the agency side, more than half (52%) the agency executives note their clients are intensifying promotion efforts at the expense of media programs. Only 12% see funds moving in the other direction. One possible reason agency people are more inclined to see a shift toward promotion is the greater diversity of client interests represented in their rosters. Another is their greater sensitivity to this kind of attrition in billings.

Spotting the likelihood that the two approaches be combined is Brad B. Moore, director-advertising and tv programming, for Hallmark Cards, who notes that in his company's case "copy approaches are being looked at to make the advertising itself more 'event/promotion' oriented...." Ronald Cox of Wrigley makes the point for advertising quite strongly: "While we are clearly out of phase with trends, we refuse to fall into the promotion trap. Advertising sells goods!"

Advertising effectiveness

Considering that limited advertising dollars will have to work harder than ever, what about the changing environment within which messages will have to fight for attention—and recall—and response?

We asked each member of the panel to what degree he or she personally thought clutter, "zapping," audience erosion, inattentiveness, growing ad volume or other negatives might impair the effectiveness of advertising itself over the next several years.

One-fourth of our panel believes advertising will be less effective in the future—and to a marked degree. Clients seem to be relatively more pessimistic than their agency counterparts, 28% of the clients and 23% of the agency members thinking there's real trouble ahead in the continuing ability of advertising to get through effectively. An additional 42% believes advertising may hurt—but to a less drastic degree.

What about the likelihood of an improvement—that advertising might actually gain in effectiveness in the near future? Only one in ten, over-all, felt any optimism; 7% of the advertisers and 13% of the agency heads see improvement on the horizon.

Quite a few Sounding Board members volunteered comments that a particularly worrisome problem is the extreme fractionalization of audience as media become more targeted and competitive in their own fight for share.

The picture, though, is not unrelievedly bleak. Quite a few executives feel there are hopeful signs in a perceived rededication to advertising which is properly focused and compellingly executed. Many use the word "breakthrough" to describe the advertising they are working hard to achieve.

On the negative side, many volunteered the view that there were intensifying problems in clutter, "lazy" strategy work, poor or indulgent execution and escalating media costs.

On the "plus" side, many pointed to the "demassification" of media—offering more opportunities to reach specific audience targets with less waste. Additionally, it's obvious that many clients and agencies are confident about—and proud of—the intensity of work now under way to move their respective advertising efforts to a higher plane of effectiveness and to minimize the damage they sense being done to commercial messages in general.

The Advertising Age Editorial Sounding Board

Formed several years ago in answer to a need for a broad-based forum of senior management opinion across the entire range of American marketing and advertising, the Advertising Age Editorial Sounding Board was updated several months ago.

Top-ranked marketing directors and advertising executives from 92 of the 200 largest American advertisers signed on, agreeing to respond to several questionnaires during the year dealing with matters of broad current concern in the business.

They are joined by a representative of top management from 130 of the 200 largest U.S. advertising agencies (in terms of U.S. domestic billings) and 11 prominent consultants active in marketing, communications and advertising strategy work.

The Sounding Board is under the chairmanship of Herbert Zeltner, a consultant in marketing and advertising and frequent contributor to Ad Age.

The complete list of members appeared in the Jan. 13 issue. In that listing, the section on consultant members was partially incorrect due to a transmission error.

The correct list of consultants:

Alvin A. Achenbaum, Cantes, Achenbaum Associates; Stephens Dietz, Dietz & Erickson; Robert M. Prentice, Cos Cob, Conn.; William M. Weilbacher, Bismark Corp.; Michael P. Ryan, Darien, Conn.; Eugene Jacobson, Dallas; Paul Jordan, Glendale, Cal.; Jim Mortensen, Briarcliff, N.Y.; H.E. McDonald, H.E. McDonald Associates; Charles Bradford Jones, Chicago; Steve Tart, Steve Tart & Associates.

The 1985 Ad Dollar Summary lists 35,000 Brands and how much they spent in 7 Media.

You can't buy this complete listing anywhere else.

These are the official industry figures. If you want to know who's spending what on advertising, BAR/LNA's Ad Dollar Summary is the reference tool you need.

Because only in this one volume will you find a complete summary of ad dollars from the PIB Magazine and Newspaper Supplement Service, from BAR's Broadcast Services and from the LNA Outdoor Advertising Service.

These are the very same figures LNA prepares for major media organizations like MPA, TVB, RAB, and OAAA. They're used by leading advertisers and their agencies. The trade journals also turn to LNA for media data.

The 1985 Volume now includes cable TV. The Ad Dollar Summary tells you how much each of 35,000 brands is spending in consumer magazines, newspaper supplements, network and spot television, network radio, outdoor advertising, and now, for the first time, in cable TV.

Brands are listed in alphabetical order along with their parent company identifications and the media used.

And that's not all. For the first time we've added listings that show the top 100 companies ranked by expenditures in each of the media.

Top 1000 Companies by total ad dollars. The Ad Dollar Summary includes other vital reference data.

For instance, there's a convenient listing of Top 1000 Companies ranked in order of total media expenditures and broken out in each of the seven media.

There's also a section in the year-end edition showing the top 10 brands in 275 product categories, with a category total.

Government pinches Chinese ad industry

By LYNNE REAVES

BEIJING—The Chinese government is taking steps to regulate the advertising industry here, which has grown substantially since major reforms were introduced in 1979 that opened the door for Western-style marketing.

New regulations include rules on ad content, the government registration of local ad agencies and a ban on all outdoor boards along Changan Avenue, this city's main thoroughfare (AA, Dec. 16).

A recent circular on advertising restrictions issued by the government said "No slanderous propaganda, obscenity or superstition will be allowed, and the wording [of ads] must not be harmful to national dignity or pander to low tastes."

Also, late last year the government ordered all local advertising agencies to register with the bureau of industry and commerce.

There are hundreds of such operations that call themselves ad agencies, but in fact they are mostly small graphics shops that have opened all over China in the past few years.

In a further tightening of the reins, additional regulations stipulate that the media "must stop coercing businesses into turning over funds to sponsor advertisements."

The government said advertising departments of mass media agencies often charge their customers exorbitant fees for ads that simply display the name of the business at the end of a tv program or on a newspaper page.

Western admen said the outdoor board ban resulted from growing anti-Japanese sentiments among Chinese officials. Both local and foreign advertisers will be affected by the order, but most of the 50 boards on Changan Avenue promote Japanese cars and electronic goods—items the average Chinese cannot afford.

Doug King, managing director at Jardine-Interpublic in Hong Kong, said the outdoor board ban "has given people a lot to think about," but added that ad executives should not overreact.

"Outdoor boards are the very visible focus of the Japanese presence in China, and the Chinese have been trying to tell the Japanese they are unhappy with their trading relations for some time," he said.

He also said the Japanese may have been "overaggressive" in their advertising.

"They are obviously the most visible," he said. "In the future, I believe people will be more careful. We may see more corporate-image ads instead of the 'Mine is the best product. Buy it' approach."

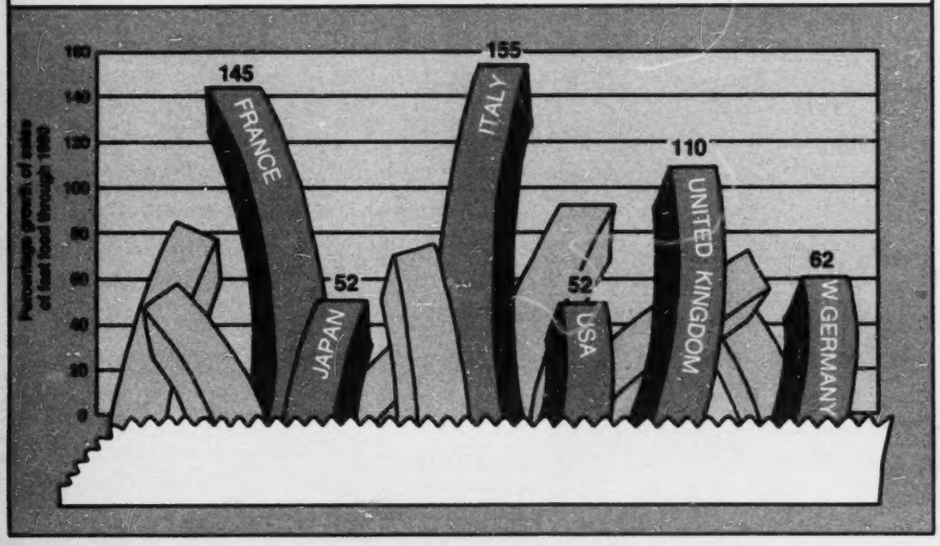
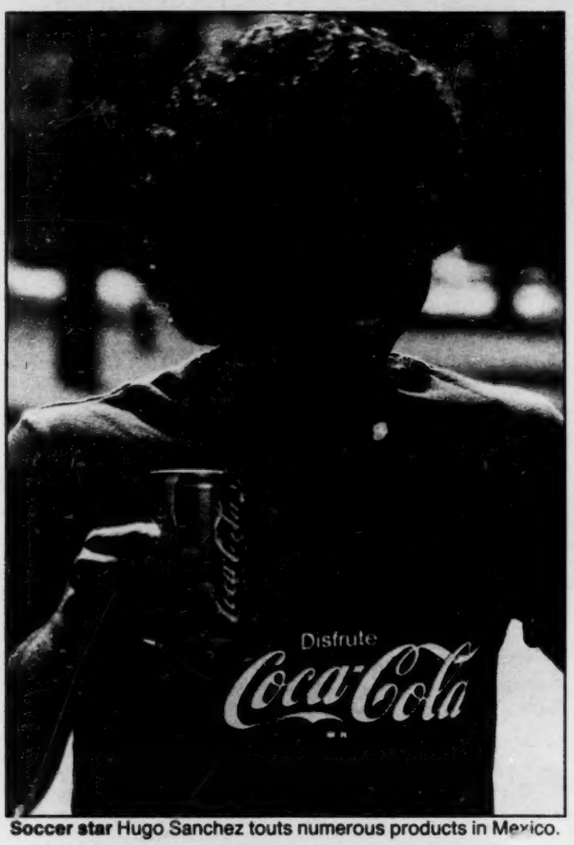
Fast-food's global growth, 1984-1990

Fast-food sales growth in Italy, France, the United Kingdom and West Germany is expected to outpace U.S.through 1990, with the strongest demand for Mexican, oriental and "health" foods. But the U.S. remains the fast-food leader with a projected $60 billion in sales by 1990. Japan is next with $2.8 billion and the U.K. third with $1.93 billion. Source: Euromonitor (London).



Europeans catching fast-food fever

Fast-food popularity is growing at such a pace that it could revolutionize European eating habits over the next decade, according to Euromonitor, a market research organization. Statistics show that fast-food operations outside the U.S. are heavily dominated by American chain or franchise operations.



Soccer star Hugo Sanchez touts numerous products in Mexico.

Soccer star shines in ads

By STEPHEN DOWNER

MEXICO CITY—The U.S. may have William (The Refrigerator) Perry, but Mexico has Hugo Sanchez.

Mr. Sanchez is neither as physically imposing as the Chicago Bears' Mr. Perry, nor does he play football. But like the 'Fridge, Mr. Sanchez, a soccer star, is the hottest athlete in Mexico when it comes to product endorsements.

His endorsements have been so extensive that even those who are not familiar with Mr. Sanchez' soccer prowess know him from his appearances in ads for Coca-Cola Co., Ford Motor Co., Richardson-Vick's, Adidas and his own clothing line.

This year, Mr. Sanchez will appear in Coke ads in the U.S. in eight states with heavy Hispanic populations, according to his business manager Jorge Berlanga. Mr. Berlanga estimated his client earns "at least $1 million a year" from endorsements.

A Mexican native who began his career with a minor-league soccer team here, Mr. Sanchez later graduated to the major leagues and played with a local team called Universidad. In 1978 he began playing for Mexico's national soccer team and in 1980 he moved to Spain to play for Atletico Madrid, a popular professional team. He played there for four years, scoring more goals than any other soccer player in Spain.

Last year, the 27-year-old Mr. Sanchez signed a five-year contract with Real Madrid, one of the world's most famous pro soccer teams. This season he is the team's leading scorer.

Real Madrid, the leading Spanish team, paid $2.5 million for the rights to purchase Mr. Sanchez from Atletico Madrid, but Mr. Berlanga declined to divulge his client's annual soccer salary.

The transfer to the prestigious Real Madrid team turned Mr. Sanchez into an idol in his homeland, a country known for its passionate soccer fans.

In addition to his endorsements, Mr. Sanchez comments on Spanish soccer every week for Televisa, Mexico's largest tv network, which transmits all Real Madrid games live.

Ad executives also say that Mr. Sanchez is easier to work with than most professional athletes.

"He is very smart," said Marco Antonio Bravo, creative director for J. Walter Thompson de Mexico, which handles Ford. "He thinks. He doesn't just open his mouth. In many cases youngsters are so good at games at school that they forget their formal education. He didn't."

Indeed, Mr. Sanchez is unique among Mexican athletes. Aside from soccer, he has a degree in dentistry and practices twice a week at a Madrid clinic.

But some say the extent of Mr. Sanchez' exposure to the Mexican pled. NAD agreed these new amounts were sufficient to include listing in the total nutrient count.

Regarding the NAD's iron-content query, the advertiser proved that the 50mgs iron in the daily dosage meets the 25-to-75mgs range accepted by authorities as safe.

The advertiser also showed NAD published articles stating that the trace minerals nickel, silicon, tin and vanadium are essential for some animals, and likely to be found essential for humans. The advertiser also produced, at NAD's request, a survey of literature featuring quantitative studies that would support the inclusion of nickel and silicon.

The advertiser said its claims in advertising and labeling will be modified based upon a total count of 28 nutrients, including nickel and silicon and excluding tin and vanadium.

In connection with NAD's concerns for performance claims made by Los Angeles-based Beverly Hills Beauty Factory's Magic Mud Formula in advertising created by David Geller & Associates, the company informed NAD that it has dropped the claims in dispute rather than go through an NARB panel review.

Hlavin Cosmetics, imported by Micro Balanced Products, Tenafly, N.J., in ads for Lavilin Long Life deodorant and foot deodorant (in-house), claimed that one application would eliminate perspiration odor for 7 to 15 days and that Lavilin lasts long after showering has washed it away. Advertising also referred to products containing aluminum, saying that the substance is believed "by medical experts to be potentially hazardous because of its connection to Alzheimer's disease." NAD questioned features in the design and execution of practical use studies used to support the claims and also objected to a lack of substantiation for claims for Lavilin foot deodorant or the references to the hazards of aluminum-based products. Subsequently, the company withdrew the claims for Lavilin foot deodorant and is also reformulating Lavilin Long Life deodorant.

Beneficial Corp., Wilmington, Del., in a direct-mail promotion (BBDO Direct, New York) for MasterCard and Visa credit-card accounts, ran a headline and copy featuring the claim, "There's no annual fee." NAD reported, however, a detailed description in the brochure noted that customers were subject to a $1.50 monthly service charge whenever they used the cards.

NAD said that prominent use of the claim, "There's no annual fee," detached from any further explanation of the charges, could be confusing. Beneficial responded that any future campaigns would not include the mailing piece and that the fee claim would not be used unless accompanied by an explanation.

Coleco Industries, West Hartford, Conn. (Richard & Edward's, New York), for its Sectaurs action figures: Children's Advertising Review Unit questioned whether the figures could perform all the movements depicted and also cited the absence of audio or video statements indicating purchase requirements in its 13 "episodic" tv spots promoting the figures with cliffhanger storylines as well as in other Sectaurs spots. Having tested actual samples of the figures, CARU found that "most," but not all, movements could be duplicated by children. Coleco agreed to add disclosure audio copy.

Matchbox Toys (USA) Ltd., Moonachie, N.J. (via Ciociola & Co., New York), for its "Robotech" action figure assortment: CARU, concerned about the lack of audio or video statements indicating whether the depicted figures shown in one tv spot were sold together or separately, was told that Matchbox will add the necessary disclosure copy.

Play Jour Inc., New York (via Richard & Edward's), for Capsela construction sets: CARU, singling out a tv spot in which two boys assembled parts from two Capsela boxes and in which completed motorized vehicles and a remote-control device were shown, felt the commercial did not make it clear to youngsters "which sets were needed to construct the featured vehicles" or whether the remote-control device required an added purchase. The advertiser, while maintaining the commercial was meant to show the line's flexibility, agreed to clarify future spots. Play Jour added that the remote-control unit could be used interchangeably with other Capsela products.

Service Merchandise Co., Brentwood, Tenn., via its in-house agency, Standard House Agency, Nashville, advertised a fully assembled, 10-speed bicycle in a flyer with a product description that said "Your cost: $69.94." The flyer was brought to NAD by a consumer who later found there was an additional charge for assembly. Service Merchandise provided NAD with a copy of its current catalog, which discloses that bicycles are sold in cartons and that there is an additional charge for assembly. The company explained the omission of the disclosure in the flyer was an oversight and it would notify its merchandising and ad departments of the importance of the disclosure in all advertising.

Kransco, San Francisco, in magazine ads for Hydroflex Swim Machine (in-house), claimed, "In 10 minutes you can get the equivalent exercise of swimming 50 laps," and "Hydroflex can be used in any pool, above-ground or in-ground, 12 ft. or longer."

The advertiser told NAD the operation is based on "tethered swimming," a common form of swimming workout. A study commissioned by Kransco showed that a well conditioned swimmer could swim as much as 775 meters in 10 minutes, depending on his work level. Even at a low work level, the advertiser said, a swimmer would do the equivalent of 55 laps in an average, 35-ft. backyard pool.

NAD felt that potential purchasers might understand the claim to mean 50 laps in a standard competition-size pool (75 ft. or 82 ft. long) could be achieved in 10 minutes. The advertiser then agreed to modify the claim.#

Beer

share. That could mean the shift of ad dollars from national to local marketing programs."

Hot markets, Mr. Goldman said, will include Boston, which Golden, Colo.-based Adolph Coors Co. entered last year to grab a surprisingly strong share; Detroit, Stroh Brewery's hometown, which Coors will enter this year; Chicago, where LaCrosse, Wis.-based G. Heileman Brewing is struggling to hold its lead against better-funded assaults from St. Louis-based Anheuser-Busch and Milwaukee-based Miller Brewing, and Los Angeles, where Coors is trying to regain its past sales strength.

One such assault, the "Made the American Way" campaign on behalf of Miller High Life, has garnered most attention in the ad world. Analysts say it's helping to slow that brand's decline.

Through selective price increases on premium brands and heavier promotion of lower-price popular and budget brands, the beer battle may be fought on a city-by-city, even store-by-store, basis, analysts say.

Pabst Brewing, Milwaukee, already has begun shipping a new low-price beer, Steinbrau (AA, Jan. 13), that it can promote to prop up its fading Pabst Blue Ribbon brand. In April, Stroh will launch a $2 million campaign for its Schaefer brand, via MCA Advertising, New York, themed "The one for fun." Heavy attention to low-price brands from A-B, Miller and Heileman is expected.

Stroh officials forecast that the price-beer segment (sold even below popular-price brands) could grow from 14 million bbls. in 1985 to 20 million bbls. by 1990, a 40% increase since 1982. Rollout of Stroh's Schaefer brand was completed in February, 1985, and sales for the year were up 9.5% to more than 4 million bbls.

Of course, the real focus of brewers' marketing plans will continue to be A-B, whose sales and over-all share continued to increase last year. Mr. Goldman estimates 1985 sales for A-B at 67.8 million bbls., up 3.8 million bbls. in an industry that grew barely more than 2 million bbls.

A-B's growth has come at the expense of No. 2 competitor Miller (down an estimated 1.3% to 37 million bbls. in 1985); Stroh (down 2.1% to 23.4 million bbls.); Heileman (down 4.2% to 16.1 million bbls.), and Pabst (down 19.8% to 9.3 million bbls.). Only for A-B competitor Coors does Mr. Goldman estimate a barrelage increase last year (up 11.4% to 14.7 million bbls.), and that is largely because of increased marketing territory.

A-B's flagship Budweiser brand, which alone accounts for better than 25% of total domestic-beer sales, is the only brand in the premium-price category (about 46% of the total market) that didn't receive a major national advertising overhaul in the past 18 months. Agency D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis, recently added a new musical score to Bud spots, but the "This Bud's for you" theme and you've-earned-it positioning remain intact.

Miller High Life, the No. 2 premium brand, has gotten a new agency (J. Walter Thompson USA, New York) and a new campaign ("Miller, made the American way"). Heileman has moved responsibility for its Old Style premium brand from Campbell-Mithun, Chicago, to Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco (and, soon, Chicago), which has created ads touting the brand as "Made with water from when the earth was pure." Coors went the celebrity route, featuring actor Mark Harmon in its 1985 "Coors is the one" campaign (via Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago), while Stroh has opted for what it openly admits is "mainstream" advertising in its "Stroh's is spoken here" effort (from Marschalk Co., New York).

Analysts generally give those campaigns high marks for effectiveness. Miller High Life, Mr. Goldman said is "declining at a declining rate." He estimates its 1985 shipments at 12.6 million bbls., down 11% from 14.1 million bbls. in 1984, but better than last year's 18% dropoff.

JWT's campaign is "well executed, nicely coattailing the patriotic surge," said John Nelson, analyst at Brown Brothers Harriman, New York. "But High Life's sales decline is still pretty horrendous."

Brewing consultant Robert Weinberg gives the highest marks to FCB's campaign for Coors, which he calls "the best advertising Coors has ever had. They used to have one good ad followed by an awful one. Now it's all good."

One of the first results of S&P Co.'s acquisition of Pabst last year was the firing of national agencies Young & Rubicam, Chicago, and McCann-Erickson, New York. Asher-Gould, Los Angeles, now Pabst's agency, has yet to produce a major multimedia campaign, although some newspaper ads bearing the theme "Pabst is the place" have appeared.

But the development and introduction of those new competitive market positionings is done. Now comes the harder part of seeing some return.

"This year will be a time for brewers to examine every project and brand carefully and for fighting as tough a battle [to increase share] as they can," said Mr. Nelson. "The difficulty will be doing it without playing into Anheuser-Busch's hands."

One of those fronts is price. A-B next month will selectively increase prices on premium-category Budweiser and superpremium Michelob. Bud increases reportedly will be greatest in markets in which the brand's competitive dominance is most unassailable, while no increases are scheduled in most New England markets to better compete with recently introduced Coors.

Rather than discount Budweiser in many markets, A-B instead will give heavier promotion support to Busch (handled by Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago) and Natural Light (DMB&B, St. Louis), its popular-price entries. Miller similarly can use Meister Brau as a discounted lure to drive High Life.

"Busch used to be the 'heavy' for Anheuser-Busch," said Mr. Goldman. "It was A-B's bodyguard, a brand that kept them above the fray of price competition, and it did it's job admirably. Now Busch is more important than ever for A-B, and it still has mileage left in it as a regional tool."

Busch, Stroh's Old Milwaukee and Schaefer brands and Miller's popular-price Meister Brau and price-brand Milwaukee's Best have presented strong challenges to Heileman, long the king of the low-price segment. Heileman has built itself into a national brewing power by using its regional budget brands—Blatz, Schmidt, Weidemann, Red, White & Blue and others—to use its brewing capacity, keep distributors happy and back its premium Old Style and Special Export brands. Heileman now has a fight on its hands.

"For the first time, Heileman's facing other breweries playing its game, the price game," said Mr. Weinberg. "But [Heileman chairman Russell] Cleary still knows how to play it, and he'll tailor deals for individual markets, too, to keep Heileman's position."

In a no-growth industry, holding on to what they have would represent a good year for most major brewers.#

Stroh on import binge

DETROIT—Stroh Brewery wants it both ways this year. It's not only looking closely at the low-end of the beer market, but also has its sights set on the top end with two new imports and a Hawaiian pseudo-import ready to go.

The imports are Barbican, a non-alcoholic malt beverage produced by England's Bass Brewery, and Koenig, the top-selling beer in Germany. Primo, a Stroh-owned premium Hawaiian beer, has been repackaged and will get a stateside test beginning in the Boston area in February. MCA Advertising, New York, handles both Barbican and Koenig, while Primo is handled in-house.

The products are the first introductions since White Mountain Cooler from a marketing hothouse Stroh set up last spring to counter flat sales of U.S.-brewed beers (AA, March 18).

Barbican, which is sold in Europe and the Middle East, will be launched in New York in March with plans for a "rapid national expansion," said John Bissell, Stroh senior vp-special products. Stroh expects its marketing muscle to expand the entire segment, which was only 440,000 bbls. in 1984.

"The potential could be a lot greater than for the low-alcohol segment, which is neither fish nor fowl," Mr. Bissell said. "We're entering with the conviction that the category will take off."

The initial ad campaign, print and spot tv, will use ex-football player Franco Harris as pitchman extolling the taste of the beverage and its imported status.

Koenig will be introduced this spring in an undisclosed pilot market. Mr. Bissell said ad plans haven't been firmed up, but hinted that Koenig's status as the best-selling beer in the world's No. 1 beer country won't be ignored.

"We believe the brand is very marketable, one we can build into one of the top 10 imports," said Mr. Bissell.

Primo has been repackaged in Hawaii with a green bottle and a label that duplicates the one used for the beer at the turn of the century. Stroh acquired Primo when it took over the Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co. in 1982.

Mr. Bissell said Primo will be positioned "in line with Canadian imports" in its Boston test. Stroh plans a number of promotional efforts such as sponsoring "Hawaiian nights" as well as some spot radio advertising to introduce the beer.#—R.S.

B&J, K&E merger allows more risk-taking

By STEWART ALTER

Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt's resignation of the $10 million-to-$12 million Prudential-Bache account in order to compete for $40 million in Merrill Lynch business (AA, Jan. 9) is the best illustration to date of why Bozell & Jacobs decided to sell to Lorimar and merge with Kenyon & Eckhardt.

C. Peebler

In his first interview since the BJK&E merger took effect Jan. 1, Charles Peebler Jr. made it clear he is planning bold moves to make BJK&E the recognized creative and international powerhouse he dreams it can be.

"If an agency or organization is going to make something happen, you're not going to be right all the time," said Mr. Peebler, who is ceo of the $1.2 billion combined operation. But with more resources, he said, "you can absorb the cost of your mistakes."

This belief applies particularly to international expansion, an area that B&J only recently had begun considering. "If we had been trying to invest on our own as aggressively as we needed to and if, God forbid, we ran into any economic downturn, it would have put at undue risk all that we had built," he said.

But is K&E's international network, with billings reported at about $100 million, really all that worthwhile?

"Kenyon & Eckhardt had an undervalued international operation," Mr. Peebler said. "It's much stronger than it was given credit for." The $100 million figure only represents "our percentage of ownership," he said, noting that the presence of the agencies themselves in their markets is much greater, with total billings of about $375 million.

B&J's and K&E's networks are now being put together "with additional resources to fill in any gaps that were there," said Mr. Peebler. "We're in the process of doing that in a very aggressive way."

Mr. Peebler has long contended that B&J was underrated creatively and it was, in fact, his efforts to combat that image that ultimately led him to K&E, though Lorimar made the initial overture.

"Probably neither Bozell & Jacobs nor Kenyon & Eckhardt was ever given the credit or the esteem and recognition in this business which we felt was deserved," he said.

B&J was "in the process of looking for a creative director to provide us with increased visibility and stature for a product we felt was underestimated," said Mr. Peebler, adding that his search for a creative spokesperson to provide that visibility often wound up with people saying he was looking for someone like Steve Frankfurt.

Mr. Frankfurt, the creative wunderkind when he served as president of Young & Rubicam/-USA in the 1960s, was vice-chairman/chief creative officer at Kenyon & Eckhardt. He retains that post in the merger.

The search for greater visibility and international capabilities was the main reason B&J explored a sale. Mr. Peebler, who was the largest stockholder with a little more than 15% of the agency, had entertained bids from Lorimar and a few other suitors, he said. The Interpublic Group of Cos. reportedly was one of those, with an offer said to be in line with Lorimar's $40 million.

Mr. Peebler would not comment except to say: "If our objective was to sell out and not worry about the future, we could have made more money, but money was not the motivation."

"The key is we're a people business," he continued, "so we have to ask, 'Is it right? Do they think alike? Do they approach problems in a similar manner? Do they genuinely appreciate and respect each other's values?'" Answering his own questions, he replied, "This really is right. We like the people. They are our kind of people."

One advantage BJK&E had in the merger process was the long incubation period between the announcement in June and the actual amalgamation on Jan. 1. This allowed working out details in advance and let the new agency come up with USAdvertising, its innovative solution to the client-conflict issue. That 40-person, $30 million agency was spun off from K&E as an autonomous subsidiary of Lorimar with the Ponderosa Steakhouse and Quaker State Motor Oil accounts. Otherwise, there would have been conflicts with B&J's McDonald's Corp. regional franchise account and Valvoline's motor-oil business.

For many employes of BJK&E, especially those at K&E, the long lead time also gave rise to anxieties that proved to be justified. On Jan. 1, the agency let go a little more than 30 professional-staff employes, mostly from K&E—though that might have happened anyway with the unexpected loss of the Seagram business late last year. Additionally, about 50 accounting-department employes, almost entirely from K&E, will be let go by March.

Those 80 persons represent a sizable chunk of staff in New York, where the agency and its other communications companies (public relations, healthcare marketing and direct marketing) employ only about 500 staffers. But no other layoffs were necessary among the ranks of the company's 3,000 employes worldwide, he said. BJK&E additionally has committed itself not to laying off any employes as a result of resigning the Prudential-Bache account.

The decisions on who would get laid off was based on the "over-all objectives of clients," said Mr. Peebler. "It has to be totally objective on what's the best quality of work and performance."

Asked whether he would do anything differently in the merger process, Mr. Peebler replied, "I'm satisfied with the decision in concept. I wish that we somehow could have had the time to do all the things and go through all the processes we did faster, in order to cut down on anticipation. I wish we would have been smart enough to have foreseen the Seagram's situation to lessen any of the pain involved in that process. I think that in any major situation, you never talk enough to the people involved and affected. We did everything we could, but you never do enough and it bothers you and leaves you with a sense of frustration."#

money should be used to purchase high-quality players.

NBC was tired of the AFL losing the Super Bowl. It needed a winner to make its regular-season package more attractive to advertisers.

"The Thursday before the game Namath guaranteed that the Jets would beat the Colts," recalled Charlie Jones, an NBC sportscaster who was involved in the telecasts of Super Bowls I and III. "NBC executives were running around screaming, 'Oh, no, what has Namath done to us.' The AFL, and therefore NBC, was battling for respect. The executives didn't want to be embarrassed. Namath didn't give a bleep, he was playing to win. When the Jets won the game, NBC knew it had something. It was really the turning point for the National Football League and the Super Bowl."

Every year, the events surrounding the Super Bowl escalate. When the Chicago Bears and New England Patriots step on the New Orleans Super Dome Jan. 26 for Super Bowl XX, the battle between CBS and NBC will move into another phase.

CBS' coverage of the National Football Conference crisscrosses the largest markets in the country. The Dallas Cowboys, San Francisco 49ers, Bears and New York Giants are all recognized as "national" teams. Executives at NBC, which covers the American Football Conference, consider the Los Angeles Raiders and the Miami Dolphins as their two most attractive teams. If the Patriots defeat the Bears, NBC instantly has another "national" team, which strengthens the package it sells to advertisers.

"Even a good performance, not necessarily a win, will make the Patriots a national team," said Michael Weisman, exec producer, NBC Sports. "Obviously, the most memorable telecasts are the upsets, the unexpected. If New England can pull it off, they will be the team people want to watch."

Lamar Hunt, owner of the Kansas City Chiefs, an AFL founder and one of the members of a joint committee of AFL owners who helped put together the merger of the two leagues, was not concerned about all this network intrigue when the committee was ironing out details. As part of the merger, he, along with Mr. Rozelle and a joint committee of NFL owners, wanted to work out the format for a championship game which would, of course, have to include a name. But they did not think the name of the game would turn out to be a key to its marketing.

The name they decided on was long and mundane: "The AFL-NFL World Championship Game." But another name was literally bouncing around in Mr. Hunt's mind. He would come home at night and play with his daughter who constantly bounced a "Super Ball" around the house. Super Ball, super ball, yes, Super Bowl.

"The committee was discussing whether we were going to allow one week between the conference championship game and 'the game,' " Mr. Hunt said. " 'What game?' someone asked. 'You know, the last game, the final game, the Super Bowl.'

"I looked around the room, checked the faces of my colleagues, saw blank stares," Mr. Hunt continued. "Everybody kind of laughed. The whole thing was spontaneous. Nobody sat down and even tried to think of a name."

The formal name was used for the first two years, but the public and media adopted the name "Super Bowl."

So the newly merged NFL had one key factor in place: A name for the product. The other key was the decision to play the game at a neutral site. This was revolutionary in sports; no championship game had ever been played at turf neither team called home. It also gave advertisers the chance to make plans in advance and allow agencies and companies to throw a week's worth of parties.

The "NFL Party," thrown by the league, is the largest affair. Some 3,000 people gather the Friday night before the game to become part of an unusual theme that changes each year, e.g., the circus.

"I've come to the conclusion that the game has become a phenomenon because it's a gradual buildup to a winner-take-all matchup," Mr. Rozelle said. "No other sport has the same arrangement. It's like a heavyweight championship was in the old days. The most glamorous event in sports."

This, along with the having-to-be-there syndrome, has led sources to speculate that advertisers today are willing to pay more than $1 million a minute just to go to the game. "Some people thought I was buying time [two 30-second spots] on the Super Bowl so I could get the [10] tickets and attend the parties," said Mike Wayne, chairman of Birmingham, Mich.-based Duracon, a company that makes truck-bed liners and is advertising for the first time on tv during Super Bowl XX. "That wasn't the reason, but I must admit there was some pride and ego involved. The Super Bowl is the ultimate. It's the super advertising experience."

Just as a new company can use the Super Bowl as a springboard, so can an athlete. By winning two Super Bowls and two Super Bowl most-valuable-player awards in four years, San Francisco 49er quarterback Joe Montana parlayed his success on the field into a number of off-the-field endeavors. Following Super Bowl XIX, Pepsi-Cola Co. paid him $500,000 to appear in a commercial for Diet Pepsi. The figure is the largest ever paid an athlete for a one-shot commercial deal. Although the 49ers were knocked out of this year's playoffs by the Giants, Mr. Montana will be addressing company gatherings at Super Bowl XX.

"In '81, Joe was a young, emerging star," said Larry Muno, president of Los Angeles-based Charter Athletes, and Mr. Montana's agent. "He makes it to the Super Bowl and all of a sudden here's this smiling kid on the cover of Time magazine. He had his helmet on, but those blue eyes, that face and the fact that he was a Notre Dame graduate told people here's the new All-American boy. Now in 1986, he's a mature gentleman. Madison Avenue has watched him grow up, and the Super Bowl has been his vehicle."

It seems with all the talk of media buys, endorsements, companies, parties and marketing, the event—the game itself—tends to get lost. "It's like Curt Gowdy always used to say," recalled NBC's Mr. Jones. " 'What about the game! What about the football game!' "

Lauder close, but no Giorgio

By PAT SLOAN

New York—Although negotiations between Estee Lauder and Giorgio for Lauder's purchase of the $110 million fragrance company broke off last week, it has become clear that Lauder is no longer content with being a one-star company.

For the last seven months, according to a Giorgio executive, the two companies have been holding preliminary talks, but now "all negotiations are off" (AA, Jan. 13).

At the same time, Lauder ceo Leonard Lauder issued a memo to his staff, which said, according to a Lauder spokesman, "Re: Possible acquisition by Estee Lauder. We aren't."

Mr. Lauder's statement was made just as new reports surfaced that the Lauder family, and not the Lauder company, would actually make the acquisition and run Giorgio as a separate entity.

At Giorgio, the corporate word is that the fragrance division is not for sale. Neither company would discuss what the sticking point to the deal was, though industry sources said it centered on price in relation to projections of Giorgio's long-term growth.

Last June, according to these sources, a Wall Street investment banking company was brought in by Lauder to appraise the value of Giorgio Parfums and arrived at $150 million, based on sales in 1984 of $60 million and a 30% operating profit. But Giorgio president Fred Hayman reportedly held firm at $185 million based on 1985 growth, which almost doubled sales.

What is believed to have concerned the Lauders, however, is whether that growth can be sustained over the long haul.

Said one source, "The question is, what is the life cycle of fragrance brands today? You have to make a guess on that."

Some retailers, who asked not to be identified, think Giorgio may peak by next year. This is not to say its sales will plummet, but that its rate of growth will not be as smart as in the past. That, and the fact that Giorgio has been essentially a one-product company, may have soured the deal.

Still, the talks prove one thing: The 43-year-old privately held Lauder company, which despite its estimated $1.25 billion in sales has never made an acquisition before, now is ready to acquire.

And that is a complete turnaround for Lauder. In 1975, before George Friedman left Lauder to develop the Ralph Lauren fragrances, he first took the Lauren concept to the Lauders. They said no and Mr. Friedman later started Warner Cosmetics under Warner Communications. That was sold to Cosmair for $146 million.

When Mr. Friedman was turned down by the Lauders, it was said that Estee Lauder, Mr. Lauder's mother and the company's founder, did not want to sell anything that either didn't carry her name or wasn't thought up by either herself or a member of the family.

But a year ago, Lauder negotiated with the San Francisco-based sportswear marketer, Esprit Corp., to license that name for a fragrance. Those talks also broke off. However, the Giorgio affair shows the company has continued searching outside for a new brand while continuing to develop its own internally.

Motown media man

Philip Guarascio, long known as a brilliant media theoretician, holds a coveted corner office in the General Motors building, a privilege usually reserved for people who have made automobiles and GM their lives. Guarascio is an outsider. He was recruited from the agency business to become executive director for advertising services on the auto maker's marketing and product- planning staff. He oversees GM's $1 billion a year advertising and promotional budget from a position that didn't exist before he filled it. For Guarascio, the lure of the GM job was a chance at making history. See Page 3.

Joey Cummings' current "Work" is the creative directorship of Tracy-Locke, the $240 million, Dallas-based powerhouse ad agency. How it differs from previous "Work" at agencies she's been at earlier is in offering her a seat on the board as well as complete creative control of the agency's 80-person creative department and its 30 or so accounts. A juicy career package for which many creatives would happily sell their Clios. See Page 52.

Special Report—Newspapers

Newspapers have discovered the power of modern marketing. Terms like niche, product development, target audience and skew now are part of the vocabulary of editors, publishers and ad executives. Reader research, price, editorial content, advertising and special promotions all come into play as newspapers seek to attract readers and advertisers. Special Report examines some of these marketing tactics, starting on Page 13.

Nynex keeps Y&R

New York—Nynex Corp. has retained incumbent Young & Rubicam to handle the regional telephone company's $10 million-to-$15 million corporate account (AA, Nov. 11, et seq.). Other finalists were BBDO and Chiat/Day here and Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston.

Alberto nods to Grey

Melrose Park, Ill.—Alberto-Culver Co. has moved its estimated $10 million toiletries account to Grey Advertising from Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, both Chicago. The company last week confirmed it was talking to other agencies, but an A-C spokesman said the company had no immediate plans for such a move (AA, Jan. 16).

'War' from N.Y. Air

New York—New York Air will launch a "Shuttle wars" campaign against Eastern Air Lines' service from here to Boston and Washington with two Super Bowl tv commercials that will air in the three markets at a cost of close to $1 million. The effort promotes services, including snacks and reserved seats. Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver handles.

VW pulls into Super Bowl

Troy, Mich.—Volkswagen of America will introduce a new wrinkle in automotive sales incentives in 15-second spots during this weekend's Super Bowl telecast on NBC-TV. Volkswagen will offer a refund of the first year's interest on private loans for its GTI model. VW will run two different spots in the pregame show, one mentioning the Chicago Bears and the other the New England Patriots. For the postgame show, the German car maker has shot two spots but will air only one. One version of the postgame commercial names the Bears as the Super Bowl victor and the other names the Patriots. Doyle Dane Bernbach handles.

Miss St. Pat's sought

Stamford, Conn.—Guinness Import Co. is running a national promotion to elect Miss Guinness Stout or Miss Harp Lager as "Miss St. Patrick's Day 1986." Guinness will run page ads of the beauty queens in USA Today in March, asking consumers to call in their choice on a 900 number. The Marketing Center, Westport, Conn., handles.

For 1985, newspapers expect national ad revenue to come in 9.5% over 1984. Have newspapers turned the corner in attracting national ads, and will national newspaper spending continue to grow at the same rate this year?

Jack Cohen, vp-print and outdoor media buying, Doyle Dane Bernbach, New York: "Newspapers have taken some positive steps to attract national advertisers, vis-a-vis the SAUs and a vast improvement in the quality of color reproduction. On the other side of the coin, however, they still have a pricing problem; the differential between the national and the retail rates seems to be widening rather than narrowing. I think expenditures in 1986 will be pretty much as they were in 1985."

J. COHEN

Louis M. Schultz, exec vp-director of media services, Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich.: With increased emphasis on local marketing by many national advertisers, newspapers have a wonderful opportunity to improve revenues. However, until newspapers come to grips with the age-old, two-tier pricing controversy and make significant progress in reducing the general vs. retail rate differential, along with an improvement in national ad positioning, they won't enjoy a significant increase in 1986 or the short-term future.

Leo E. Scullin, senior vp-director of print and new electronic media communications services, Young & Rubicam, New York: "They have not turned the corner. One must isolate the rate increases from this figure. Rates have risen in the 7%, plus or minus 0.5, range and there has only been 1% to 2% of real growth. It's not a trend, it's a blip. In my estimation, no significant increase in national advertising will occur until there is an elimination of the rate differential.

W. HADLOCK

Willard Hadlock, exec vp-director of media services, Leo Burnett USA, Chicago: I don't know what's going to happen [this] year. I think that as long as newspapers have local rate differential. . .they'll continue to have a problem. The newspaper industry as a whole has got to come up with a rate program that says 'we care as much about the national advertiser as we do about local advertisers.' Until they do that, they're sending a message to national advertisers that they're second-class citizens.

Frank Hajek, associate media director-director, print media relations, Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York: "There has probably been very little change. From the agency point of view, there are two things that will require the most attention and are probable causes for them not making national advertisers' media schedules or being knocked off. They are pricing, either heavy out-of-pocket costs, rate differentials or premiums, and the fact that newspapers are the only visual medium that doesn't have good, consistent color.

Marketing is the industry's rising star

By William Gloede

It was scarcely a decade ago that a typical newspaper executive was more likely to equate the word marketing with a trip to a grocery store than with the science of moving manufactured goods into the hands of consumers.

Now, editors, publishers and ad executives are using terms like niche, product development, target audience—even skew—when they talk about their business. Newspapers have discovered the power of modern marketing.

In the past 15 years, the newspaper business gradually has said "yes" to marketing, and some newspaper executives have begun embracing its tenets almost as fervently as they do those of the U.S. Constitution.

"The newspaper business was a labor-intensive industry with hefty production parameters that produced a traditional and relatively unchanged medium," says Charles Kinsolving, vp-new technology for the Newspaper Advertising Bureau, New York. "Formats hadn't changed since Benjamin Franklin's time."

Although there were some newspapers that paid heed to marketing before the early to mid-1970s, most were run by editors and publishers who believed that the relationship between the newspaper and its readers, based on the First Amendment, made the newspaper itself special.

"There was a historical resistance to think of newspapers as just another package good, just another commodity," says John Mennenga, vp-research and marketing for Sawyer-Ferguson-Walker Co., a New York-based company that represents newspapers to advertisers.

That resistance began to break down as news-

Putting muscle behind media mix

By Janet Simons

You see that sleepy guy in his pajamas, the one trying to keep snow out of his slippers as he hops to the curb to pick up his morning paper? The newspaper reader, publishers used to assume, would always be there, cursing his paper carrier and clutching his bathrobe against the wind.

They don't take him for granted anymore. Publishers are aiming millions of dollars of advertising at him in an effort to assure that he, and new readers just like him, will hop across America's lawns every morning for decades to come.

Advertising to attract readers is nothing new. Newspapers always have plugged holes with in-paper ads designed to persuade newsstand patrons to subscribe. What's new is a growing realization that newspapers need to promote themselves to survive, a realization fueled by newspaper failures and bleak statistics indicating that the readership base is continuing to erode, according to the American Newspaper Publishers Assn., Reston, Va.

For example, to promote its Chicago Tribune, the Tribune Co. spends between $3 million and $4 million a year on media that include tv, radio and outdoor, says Richard Honack, manager of promotions and special events.

"It's necessary just to keep us in the market," Mr. Honack says. The paper faces competition from New York-based News America Publishing's Chicago Sun-Times, another heavy user of tv and radio advertising. Tribune radio spots push single-copy sales, and tv ads focus on image, presenting the paper as Chicago's market leader.

"For such a long time, everyone preached the use of in-paper ads," Mr. Honack says. "But that's like restricting toothpaste advertising to messages on the backs of the tubes. The only customers who see them have already bought your product."

However, marketing of toothpaste and newspapers is more comparable than it once was. As newspaper promotion departments have expanded to become marketing departments, various papers have recruited veterans of the package-goods industry to guide their efforts. These veterans bring a firm belief in the value of radio and tv advertising.

Pierce DeGross, former vp-hair products for L'Oreal, New York, is director-marketing for the Washington Post. He compares the Post's current campaign, "We are everything that's Washington," to the image advertising previously used by L'Oreal. Created by Needham Harper Worldwide, New York, it features evocative scenes of Washingtonians reading the Post as part of their daily routine, backed by an anthem sung by country singer Lee Greenwood. Introduced in May, the effort is the paper's first year-round, image-based campaign. Previous tv campaigns were limited to short-term subscription pitches.

While the Post attempts to strengthen its king-of-the-hill position in the market, other metropolitan dailies struggle for readers amidst strong competition.

For example, in Denver the Rocky Mountain News, owned by the Cincinnati-based Scripps Howard chain, began using tv after its competition, the Denver Post, was purchased by promotion-minded Times Mirror Co., Los Angeles, in 1981. Even considering that the Scripps Howard newspaper properties are considerably smaller than Times Mirror's, the contrast between the two chains' tv advertising expenditures is striking. The Scripps Howard chain spent only $224,000 nationally on spot tv advertising in 1984; Times Mirror spent nearly $3 million, according to the Television Bureau of Advertising, New York.

"The Post began using television, and we didn't want them to win the battle of perception by default," says Vern Mallinen, Rocky Mountain News promotion director.

In addition to building image, circulation and ad revenues, newspapers have learned to look to advertising as a short-term problem-solving strategy. The Seattle Times tv and radio advertising budget nearly doubled after May, 1982, when the Times and the Seattle Post-Intelligencer signed a joint operating agreement, says James Mace, marketing services manager for the Times, which handles business functions for both papers.

"It has taken us more than two years to get the public to understand the new arrangement, and we advertised heavily, particularly on the radio, to explain it," Mr. Mace says.

Similarly, at the beginning of a strike against the Chicago Tribune, the paper saturated the radio airwaves for six weeks to assure readers that the paper would continue to publish.

Radio often is the medium of choice for such campaigns because of its penetration ability, lower production costs and quick turnaround time, industry observers say.

Over-all, newspapers are rapidly expanding their use of radio advertising, according to the Radio Advertising Bureau, New York. Reports from member stations on cash transactions, excluding trade-outs, show newspapers spent $3.7 million on radio advertising in the first nine months of 1985, compared with $2.1 million in the first nine months of 1984—an increase of 75%. The increase is attributable to the medium's strength as a targeting tool, says Daniel Flamberg, senior vp-communications for the RAB.

"For a long time, the print media saw radio only as a means to give a quick rabbit punch to street sales," Mr. Flamberg says. "Now it's being used much more broadly, for example, to support image campaigns."

However, radio is not the only medium previously misunderstood by the newspaper industry. Although tv has become an integral part of a newspaper's media mix,

The Chicago Tribune focuses on the image of a "great newspaper" in its tv spots, part of its $3 million to $4 million media campaign.

Newspapers are looking to advertising as a short-term problem-solving strategy also.

papers began seeing the decline of circulation and circulation penetration, the number of newspapers sold in a particular market relative to the population of that market. With that decline came stronger competition for local ad dollars, first from broadcast media, then from weekly newspapers and shoppers and finally from direct mailers.

Through the Newspaper Advertising Bureau and the American Newspaper Publishers Assn., Reston, Va., the industry funded and participated in a six-year study of newspaper readership called the Newspaper Readership Project. It is that effort, begun in June, 1977, and concluded in May, 1983, that ushered in the era of newspaper marketing, industry executives say.

The project sought to find the reasons readers were abandoning newspapers. It looked at who readers were, why they read and what they read. Similarly, it studied nonreaders and their reasons for shunning newspapers. The effort, a first, smacked of market research, and it was backed by some of the biggest publishers in the business.

"It really helped break down the wall between editorial and advertising," says James Dunaway, vp-information for the Newspaper Advertising Bureau. Editors, heretofore zealously protective of the news product, began to understand that what they believed readers wanted was not necessarily what readers wanted.

At the same time the industry embarked on the readership project, the New York Times developed what at the time was a new concept in newspapering. It began special sections keyed to the day of the week with the roster eventually filling out to Sports on Monday, Science on Tuesday, Living on Wednesday, Home on Thursday, and Weekend on Friday.

The Times was followed throughout the industry as newspapers realized that separate segments of their readership had definite interests and a one-day-a-week section could address these interests while providing a specific editorial environment for advertising messages.

About midway through the readership project, individual newspapers began cooperating with one another in ventures thought to be of value to the industry. The most visible of these efforts was the Standard Advertising Unit system, a series of standard ad sizes conceived to alleviate advertiser and agency problems with ad production. A preliminary system was adopted in 1982, with a modified system adopted in 1984.

Another result of the new spirit of cooperation was the syndicated research study of newspaper audiences. Conceived in response to advertiser and agency calls for standarized, comparable research across the nation's top markets, the industry has funded and participated in four such studies since 1980, the most recent being the Simmons-Scarborough study released last summer.

Also during the readership project, newspapers went on a capital-spending binge centered in the marketing functions of packaging and distribution. New press equipment brought color to the pages of scores of newspapers and new computerized conveying, inserting, bundling and sorting equipment began converting the typical newspaper mailroom—a nightmare of labor intensivity and inefficiency—into a modern materials handling and distribution facility.

Although there are no industrywide figures on advertising and promotion, it is generally believed in the newspaper business that both are up substantially since the dark days of the early '70s. In the first nine months of 1985, newspapers spent 75% more on radio advertising than during the same period in 1984, according to Radio Advertising Bureau, New York. Radio expenditures by local papers have increased from $2.1 million to $3.7 million over that period, the RAB reports. Even papers in so-called noncompetitive markets are running tv and radio campaigns.

Although the results of newspapers' new marketing prowess are difficult to quantify, over-all circulation has been moving upward through the 1980s. Also, newspapers will remain the nation's No. 1 advertising medium in 1986, showing a gain in the 8% range over 1985's $25.5 billion in advertising investments, according to Robert Coen, senior vp-director of forecasting at McCann-Erickson, New York.

Price gains value as marketing tool

By Mark Watanabe

Executives of Gannett Co. recognize a good cup of coffee when they taste one. They also know how much it costs, and they're willing to pay for it.

Likewise, these executives say, newspaper readers recognize a good paper when they see one—and are willing to pay for it.

But that's where the analogy ends. While the price of a cup of coffee has risen from 25 cents, the newspaper reader of today has to shell out, in most cases, only 25 cents to get his daily fix.

"We haven't kept pace in terms of comparative value with a cup of coffee," says Lee J. Guittar, president of Gannett's USA Today. "You can still buy a lot of newspapers for a quarter, but a quarter cup of coffee is kind of hard to find."

Industry statistics and interviews with newspaper circulation executives say newspapers are underpriced for the "value" consumers receive. But some publishers have become less resistant to increases, realizing that price is a crucial part of the over-all marketing plan and not just a function of circulation.

"Newspapers are worth much more than we're getting for them," says Howard Hay, vp-circulation of the Chicago Tribune. "Unfortunately, as an industry we have not convinced the consumer, nor have we tried to convince the consumer, that the newspaper is of greater value."

As recently as 1975, two-thirds of all daily newspapers in the U.S. cost 15 cents, according to the American Newspaper Publishers Assn., Reston, Va. In 1985, nearly 80% of all papers were only 25 cents and had been at that level for five years. Single-copy prices for Sunday newspapers are mostly at 50 cents and 75 cents, compared with 25 cents and 35 cents about 10 years ago.

Revenue figures, too, indicate there is room to expand circulation income. In 1975, circulation revenue, determined by multiplying the single-copy rate by circulation, accounted for 32.3% of total revenue, defined as advertising and circulation income. In 1984, that figure had decreased to 23.9%.

At the same time, the gap between newsstand prices for newspapers and magazines has widened considerably.

How high single-copy prices can go may be problematic, but studies indicate there is plenty of breathing room. "People like to think in even change," says Chris Urban, president of Urban & Associates, a Sharon, Mass.-based media research company. "In other words, the days of the nickel or dime increase, at least in my opinion, are pretty much gone. We're talking here of quarters as being the basic coin unit."

There are indications newspapers are taking heed. For example, all but three of Gannett's 86 newspapers will have a daily single-copy price of at least 35 cents by the end of 1986, John J. Curley, the company's president, recently told securities analysts. USA Today reached a cover price of 50 cents in August, up from 35 cents. Mr. Guittar says that price was always part of the business plan.

Other papers have increased or are planning to increase their prices. The Chicago Tribune has targeted an April start for a $1.25 Sunday edition, an increase from $1. In Kansas City, Mo., Capital Cities Communications increased the price of the Sunday Star from 75 cents to $1 in October. At Lee Enterprises, a Davenport, Ia.-based chain, 15 of 18 dailies cost 35 cents.

Despite these signs, newspapers overall are reluctant to let the reader bear more of the costs. The cause-effect relationship between price rise and circulation fall seems as obvious as the fundamentals of supply and demand.

Also, newspapers historically have maintained low prices; the term "penny press" is enough to evoke nostalgia.

Finally, especially in competitive markets, there is an aversion to losing even marginal circulation to a price increase.

Such is the case in Detroit, where the long-standing competition between the News and the Free Press has led to the lowest-priced metropolitan dailies in the U.S. The News, soon to be owned by Gannett, is 15 cents daily in the metro area and 75 cents Sunday; Knight-Ridder Newspapers' Free Press is 20 cents daily and 75 cents Sunday.

"The pricing here has been rather reserved because of the circulation war that has been going on," says Myron Didyk, circulation director of the Free Press.

How intense this "war" has been is illustrated partly by the 75-cent Sunday prices. The Free Press instituted the price, up from 50 cents, in January, 1985; the News followed suit four months later. Both papers since have lost Sunday circulation, though the News' decline may be less. The News' Sunday circulation is 837,821, a 3.2% decline from the year-earlier period. This compares with the Free Press' 754,615 in the latest reporting period, down 6.1% from the previous year.

One item of interest is what will happen to pricing after Gannett assumes leadership of the News: Insiders have suggested Gannett will move the price closer to industry norms; the Free Press probably would do likewise.

At the other end of the scale is a newspaper that has demonstrated little hesitation to take the price-increase plunge. On June 17, the Quad-City Times began charging 50 cents for its daily editions and $1.25 for the Sunday paper, prices a competitor calls "preposterous."

"We have felt here that newspapers have been and are underpriced," says John Gardner, publisher of the Times, which, like owner Lee Enterprises, is based in Davenport, Ia.

The Times has been attempting to educate its market to higher pricing by working hard to develop a product that will merit the greater cost, Mr. Gardner says.

For example, he points to the paper's attempts to gain greater visibility in the Putting muscle behind media

that wasn't always the case.

"I'd say television's use as a device to sell newspapers is only 10 or 12 years old," says Dick Collins, director-public affairs for the Boston Globe. This growing trend toward tv advertising required the reversal of some longstanding industry resistance. In 1935, newspapers laid claim to 44% of all advertising revenues in the nation. Then along came tv, and by 1960, the newspaper share of the media market had dropped to 30.8% and since has edged down and lingered for the past few decades at about 27%.

Thurman R. Pierce Jr., U.S. manager-print media for J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, who compiled the market share figures from material gathered annually by McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, says the newspaper industry still hasn't recovered.

"For years, someone from the Television Bureau of Advertising would make a pitch at the annual meeting of the International Newspaper Promotional Assn., and it would fall on deaf ears," Mr. Collins says. "Nobody seemed to feel it was the appropriate medium."

But as market pressure grew, resistance gradually evaporated, he says. Spending by the newspaper industry on spot tv has nearly doubled in the past five years, going from $15.3 million in 1980 to $29.1 million in 1984, according to the TvB. During the first nine months of 1985, newspapers spent $22.3 million on spot tv, down slightly from 1984's nine-month figure of $22.4 million.

The State in Columbia, S.C., pokes fun at tv newscasts in spots aimed at non-newspaper readers.

Perhaps acceptance of the medium parallels the industry's desire to reach those potential readers, ages 18 to 34, that make up a bulk of the viewing audience.

For example, building youthful readership is the goal behind the first major media campaign launched by the State, a Columbia, S.C.-based newspaper with a circulation of 115,331. While radio plays a strong role, the campaign is keynoted by a 30-second tv spot poking fun at tv newscasts.

"The campaign is addressed to non-newspaper readers, ages 25 to 35, to tell them the paper is a necessity of their lives," says Robert Kaminer, director-marketing services for Columbia Newspapers, the paper's publisher. "We're really hitting at the group that grew up with tv."

community, brighter approach to the news and enhanced use of color.

Not surprisingly, these arguments do not convince Hal Wilkerson, director-special projects and circulation with competing Moline (Ill.) Dispatch. "Lee Enterprises is a very heavy-handed and aggressive organization when it comes to the bottom dollar," he says. "They have really stuck it to subscribers here for five or six years."

The increase, up from 35 cents, was unjustified particularly because of the state of the farm economy upon which the Quad-Cities market is so dependent, Mr. Wilkerson says.

The Dispatch canceled a planned increase in Sunday price because of these circumstances, he says.

Not surprisingly, the Times' circulation has declined 18% since the price increase, according to Glenn Morrison, the paper's manager of single-copy sales. But the increased revenue has more than offset the drop, he says.

The Quad-Cities episode may be symbolic of publishers lowered resistance to price pressures.

Even Mr. Wilkerson, despite his aversion to the Times' move, admits his paper probably could absorb an increase from 25 cents to 35 cents daily and 75 cents to $1 on Sundays.

That resistance may lessen even more as newspapers discover price has less impact on circulation than supposed.

"We're finding that price sensitivity is much more a measure of people's loyalty to a paper than any kind of economic argument," Ms. Urban says.

How much growth or loss that comes with a price increase depends on three factors, she says: Whether there's a real competitor in the market; the general economic health of the market, and, most importantly, the general quality of the paper.

If a paper has added any quality to itself during a price increase, it will tend to wash out the effects of the increase because people make a price-value relationship, Ms. Urban says. This does not necessarily mean adding more elements to the paper; it may simply mean doing a better job, she says. "Make the paper easier to read, less of a burden to get through."

The Wall Street Journal, which has undergone four newsstand and four subscription price increases since 1979, is a prime example of a newspaper that rests strongly on the three factors Ms. Urban cites.

As a result, the price increases have not hurt circulation.

However, the Journal did experience some falloff when it shot above the $100-a-year home-delivery price in 1984, a 5% decline since recovered, according to Kenneth Burenga, vp-circulation.

The round number seems to represent a psychological barrier. "Those are difficult price increases to get through," Ms. Urban says.

USA Today has faced that situation in its brief history.

When the paper increased its price to 35 cents from 25 cents, it lost circulation.

The decline occurred partly because rack customers had to search for two coins instead of one to come up with 35 cents, Mr. Guittar says. However, this kind of drop did not occur after Gannett raised the price to 50 cents, still a two-coin purchase.

On such outwardly trivial matters do big decisions sometimes lie.

"The marginal readers who might be shaken out by a price increase would probably by shaken out by the natural attrition of the market," Ms. Urban says. This should allow advertisers access to a more efficient penetration of the market, thereby increasing the value of the newspaper.

And the value, Gannett executives and others would agree, would then match that of a cup of coffee. ■

The spot, created by Cook Reuef & Associates, Columbia, was introduced in November.

It shows delivery men tossing tv sets tuned to the news onto a porch.

The resident, baffled by the blaring pile of tv sets, is relieved when a newspaper carrier throws him a copy of the State.

In a smaller market, the Scranton (Pa.) Times shares a similar goal. The Times, Scenes of Washingtonians reading the Washington Post are part of the paper's image-based campaign.

with a daily circulation of 57,611, attributes recent gains over the competing Scranton Tribune, daily circulation 39,019, partly to a circulation-building campaign that has been running on tv and radio intermittenly since December, 1984.

Its message, aimed at nonsubscribers ages 22 to 34 years old, is that people need to read a newspaper to get ahead. It's tagged, "The smart people read the Times."

"We're scratching and clawing here for every dollar, every ad, every subscriber," says Stew Kearney, director-community relations and promotion for the Scranton Times. "Only one of us is going to survive."

Although a sophisticated advertising strategy is as urgently needed in Scranton, Pa., as in Chicago and Washington, limited resources make it difficult to come by.

In response, the Reston, Va.-based International Newspaper Promotion Assn. has released the Newspaper Promotion Operation Survey to its members.

This survey of promotion budgets is broken down by market size and designed to help members decide on appropriate media budgets.

The survey is a response to demand that has escalated in the past few years, says Michael Kane, assistant to the executive director of the INPA.

"As the smaller newspapers have been getting more and more heavily involved in promotion, we've been getting maybe one or two calls a day from member papers who need budget help," Mr. Kane says.

"This will help them understand what other papers their size are doing.

"We've seen a lot of newspapers—even small ones—start advertising on television and radio over the past couple of years," Mr. Kane says.

"Still, considering the stiffness of the competition, the industry needs to see much more.

"Publishers are traditionally conservative spenders. Some of them may never be convinced of the need to advertise," he says. "But we keep hoping." ■

Technology transforms production and package

By William F. Gloede

You can have the best news product in the world, but if you can't get it out on the streets where people can buy it, it's worthless, according to an old newspaper adage.

Since 1975, newspapers have spent an estimated $9 billion on capital improvements aimed at getting papers to the right people at the right time while making the product itself more attractive, according to industry estimates and the U.S. Census of Manufacturers.

A quiet but far-reaching revolution in technology has transformed the business from a huge sweatshop into a space-age marvel. This revolution has allowed the introduction of color in many papers. It's given others the wherewithal to reach every household in their markets. It's also made the newspapers more timely, attractive and accurate.

The technological revolution in newspapers began in the mid-1960s with the introduction of cold type into the production process, a process that had remained ostensibly the same since Ottmar Mergenthaler developed the Linotype in 1884. Cold type killed hot lead, greatly reducing the time it took to turn news copy into type. While tolling the death knell for a whole class of newspaper production employes, it made the working environment much more livable.

Cold-type composition systems were rapidly followed by the introduction of computerized text processing, which allowed reporters and editors to compose stories on computer terminals. But the computer did not stop there.

"The introduction of the computer in the newspaper business really has had a big impact," says Pete Romano, director-technical services and training for the American Newspaper Publishers Assn., Reston, Va.

Today, there's scarcely a department in any major newspaper that isn't reliant on computers. From the newsroom and the ad department through the composing room, into the camera room, then into platemaking and even in the pressroom, computers are the rule.

"The intial thrust was in economies of operations," Mr. Romano says. "Once this was done, the next thing they looked at was better serving the reader and the advertiser."

Since 1982, when Gannett Co.'s USA Today proved to the business that a quality color newspaper could be produced under the most critical production parameters, newspapers have placed a greater premium on quality.

"The biggest thrust I've seen is quality improvement," Mr. Romano says. "There's a new animal in newspaper operations—the quality control manager."

An example of how newspapers are attending more to the quality of the printed product is the number of newspapers that have purchased digital color scanning equipment. These machines, which sell for about $500,000, allow precise separation of color artwork and give newspapers the ability to compensate for the shortcomings inherent in printing color on newsprint.

> "The biggest thrust I've seen is quality improvement. There's a new animal in newspaper operations—the quality control manager."
> Pete Romano, ANPA

Results of digitally scanned color art can be impressive, and the wave of scanner purchases throughout the industry is evidence of newspapers' growing commitment to quality, Mr. Romano says.

"There's no way in the world a newspaper is going to coat justify a scanner unless it also has a commerical printing operation," he says. "They're making an investment in quality."

The quality issue translates roughly into the packaging end of the marketing equation, and in packaging, the revolution is just beginning.

There's a new process in the newspaper business called pagination, which began development as page layout systems at Westchester Rockland Newspapers, a group of 10 Gannett-owned dailies north of New York, in 1981. The next year the Pasadena Star-News, a Knight-Ridder newspaper, began producing pages containing text, graphics and advertising on the first system capable of handling all three. However, the Star-News is not yet capable of fully storing and manipulating graphics.

stall or currently installing a system that entails composing a newspaper page, with all graphics in place, on a computer terminal linked with a printing plate maker include the Oklahoma City Daily Oklahoman and Philadelphia Inquirer.

In theory, pagination allows a newspaper to be composed by an editor with the resultant page image sent directly to the plate maker. No manual operations, such as pasteup or camera work, are required. Although full pagination technology is still under development, it will be available and working in the newspaper business within five years, Mr. Romano says. It will give newspapers unparalleled flexibility in page design, both in news and advertising.

There's another revolution now in progress, this one in what traditionally has been called the mailroom. The ANPA is leading a charge to get the name of the mailroom changed to the "packing and distribution" center, because most newspapers mail few copies, Mr. Romano says.

Newspaper libraries are moving onto computer storage, creating an eiectronic historical record that's updated daily.

The mailroom, where newspapers are sent once they've come off the press to be collated, bundled and moved onto delivery trucks, has always been a labor-intensive operation. But a new generation of equipment made by the Zurich, Switzerland-based Ferag Co. is changing the nature of the mailroom with a conveying and inserting system that allows automated inserting of special sections and circulars on-line with the press at speeds of up to 70,000 copies per hour.

When eventually linked with specialized computer equipment, the system will allow each newspaper to be custom-tailored to a particular subscriber. That would mean one reader could get a special fashion section while another received a section on international finance, all in the same day's edition of the newspaper.

Although no newspaper is that customer-specific, that day is not far off, according to the ANPA. Newspapers are using this type of equipment to create new advertising and editorial zones, giving advertisers the ability to reach target consumers at lower cost than running in all editions of the paper.

In the pressroom, formerly the dirtiest place in a newspaper plant, computers are now setting and running the presses, allowing for greater control over quality and paper waste. At some newspapers, once the paper web is threaded through the presses, the whole operation—from the loading of the reels of newsprint to the cut and folded finished product—is controlled from a remote "quiet room" that looks more like a Pentagon war installation than a nerve center for a printing plant.

Also, computers run the facsimile equipment that allows newspapers including the Wall Street Journal and USA Today to transmit pages to satellite printing plants dispersed throughout the country simultaneously.

Similar equipment allows the Chicago Tribune to transmit pages from its headquarters on Michigan Ave. to Freedom Center, its production plant several blocks away, and the New York Times to send pages from Manhattan to its plant in Carlstadt, N.J.

The same technology will be used in AdSat, a private venture trying to obtain funding for a satellite transmission system for national advertising. AdSat, due to be tested by a dozen major dailies and four major ad agencies this year, will allow advertisers to get ads into tomorrow's newspaper today.

"If there's a big snowstorm in Des Moines, Firestone could get an ad for snow tires into the paper the next morning," Mr. Romano says.

Through all the computerization, newspapers have begun to save the information that used to be left on the composing room floor. In the future, should the electronic newspaper become a viable business, subscribers will be able to access the newspaper's database and, in effect, edit their own paper by selecting what stories they want to read.

Newspaper libraries are moving onto computer storage, creating an electronic historical record that's updated daily. Also, many newspapers, pressed by competition from direct mailers, have compiled computerized lists of households in their market, called a subscriber-nonsubscriber file, which is used in distributing so-called total market coverage products.

For a business that only recently allowed the word marketing to creep into the executive lexicon, newspapers have come a long way in improving operations to meet the needs and desires of readers and advertisers. But, as Mr. Romano puts it, "We've got a long way to go."

Research serves editorial, advertising interests

By Richard Edel

Newspapers turn to research for insights into consumer behavior and attitudes to help position papers in the market and against competing media.

Newspapers are taking more active roles in defining and developing their markets through syndicated and proprietary research. This enables them to target editorial products to readers and to consult with advertisers on the reach and frequency of impressions they can expect from using newspapers.

Although some newspapers have been conducting market research since the 1940s, most began using it in earnest during the mid-1970s when readership and profits declined for the first time since World War II, says David Nelson, professor at Northwestern University and director of Chicago programs for the Medill School of Journalism in Evanston, Ill.

Newspapers turn to research for insights into consumer behavior and attitudes to help position papers in the market and against competing media. Research is increasingly the basis for decisions to use zoned editions, to switch from evening to morning or all-day publishing cycles, and to modify editorial content and approach to appeal to targeted readers.

Publishers need research to help them cope with a variety of social and life-style trends and with greater competition from national newspapers, weeklies, free papers and shoppers, says Frederick Currier, chairman of Detroit-based Market Opinion Research.

Because circulation has remained relatively static in recent years, newspapers zero in on each other's readers when looking for circulation gains, and that requires a better understanding of the market, Mr. Currier says. "It's one cannibal against another."

posed by electronic media through a merging of tv, computer and telecommunications technologies. The falling cost of electronic information delivery is putting a squeeze on all print media, he says.

The upshot is that newspapers must isolate and develop their strengths, both as editorial products and advertising vehicles, to remain competitive, Mr. Currier says. But research is not a panacea that can transform a mediocre product into a great one. A host of factors unique to the publication, its staff and the needs of its readership also must be considered.

"You'll never paint a Rembrandt with research, but you still like to know the parameters," Mr. Currier says.

Research is little more than a pile of numbers, says Arthur Gorlick, assistant managing editor for research and development at the Seattle Post-Intelligencer. "The hard part is identifying problems, interpreting the research and trying to find new directions."

The Post-Intelligencer conducted extensive market research early in 1983 when it entered a joint operating agreement with the Seattle Times. Special attention was given to demographic, geographic and image positioning in an effort to build circulation in targeted areas and to improve readership in all sections, Mr. Gorlick says.

"We were interested in drift, in what readers were saying. We needed to get a handle on who our readers are and what we could do to help address their needs better."

Before final tabulation of the research, done both in-house and by an independent research company, the paper began changing content and graphic design, and it shifted or hired staff to improve coverage in key areas.

Jeffrey Toth

One surprise uncovered by the research was significant interest in expanded coverage of science and technology, Mr. Gorlick says. The paper immediately hired a science writer and gave greater emphasis to stories by its medicine reporter. Science and high technology also became the Tuesday theme of the redesigned Living section, he says.

The P-I also expanded coverage of local news in areas targeted for circulation growth, adding such weekly features as Neighborhood Profile and more stories in brief.

The paper emphasized local companies and people in an expanded business section. A regular feature is "A Conversation With . . . ," an interview with a local business leader. A periodic feature is Success Story, profiling the rise of small companies.

In some instances, new directions involved better labeling and organization, Mr. Gorlick says. For example, readers wanted more national and world news, but coverage was limited by the size of the front section. So the newspaper designated special pages and used more prominent labeling.

"We might not be giving them more national and international news, but it seems like more," Mr. Gorlick says.

A positive indication that the P-I's changes are on track is an increase in daily circulation to about 210,000 from about 180,000 in 1984, Mr. Gorlick says.

"The strength of the product is going a long way toward retaining those gains."

Research techniques have not changed in 40 years. Basic techniques include focus groups, where consumer reactions are monitored during a free interchange of ideas; personal interviews, usually conducted door-to-door or through shopping mall intercepts, and telephone interviews, the preferred technique for large research projects because of its relatively low cost. Most surveys also include some form of questionnaire or diary, which the consumer completes during the interview session or mails in afterward.

BOSCOV'S SELECTS HARRISBURG

Boscov's is banking on Harrisburg. Albert R. Boscov, the Pennsylvania-based retailing giant, is fast becoming a legend in his own time.

Using the Harrisburg Sunday Patriot-News to run interference, Boscov opened his 11th store last fall in the revitalized Camp Hill Shopping Mall which is located in one of the Harrisburg market's most affluent communities.

Albert, who has achieved phenomenal success with his family-owned retail chain, made the decision to open a Harrisburg store only after concluding that the Harrisburg Patriot-News was so dominant in the Harrisburg marketplace that a market strategy built around the newspaper would insure success. His strategy is paying handsome dividends. He ran 70 pages of advertising to announce his opening and incredible traffic jams followed for most of the week.

In selecting the Harrisburg market, Boscov moved into the nation's 82nd largest metro area. It ranks 73rd in retail sales ($3,575,673,000) and 77th in effective buying income. Boscov knew the Sunday Patriot-News' nearly 80% penetration of that market would help him achieve his goal. He turned out to be right again.

Expensive information yields valuable results

In 1983, Robert O'Neill, ad director for New Orleans-based Times-Picayune Publishing Corp., which publishes the Times-Picayune/States Item, sensed an opportunity. Although his city was losing its Woolco outlets when that company closed national operations and a large independent appliance dealer also was for sale, Silo, a Philadelphia-based discount electronics and appliance company, was looking for expansion markets.

In addition, the Times-Picayune had commissioned a study by Belden Associates, Dallas, on shopping habits, which showed significant local consumer interest in appliances and electronics.

> "We can show advertisers how effective or ineffective they are in reaching the various types of shoppers."
> Robert O'Neill, Times-Picayune Publishing

Mr. O'Neill contacted Michael O'Hara, vp-sales promotion at Silo, and presented the research. "The next thing you know, they were signing leases here," Mr. O'Neill says.

The example illustrates an industry trend toward newspapers taking a more active role in defining and developing their markets through syndicated and proprietary research. This enables them to consult with advertisers on the reach and frequency of impressions they can expect from using newspapers alone or as part of a media mix.

"We can show advertisers how effective or ineffective they are in reaching the various types of shoppers," Mr. O'Neill says. "We know who picks up the newspaper, what their interests are, where they shop, and we can divide the pie into 10 slices so they can focus on [zoned areas]." The Times-Picayune gives advertisers comparisons with electronic media and consults in media strategy.

Despite the expense of generating this information, it has the potential to bring big paybacks. For example, Silo pumped more than $1 million into newspaper advertising in New Orleans during its first year there, Mr. O'Hara estimates.

The example illustrates the need of newspapers and other media to become increasingly sophisticated in their research if they hope to remain competitive as advertising vehicles, says Robert Rudasill, research manager for the Atlanta Journal and Constitution.

"Newspapers have been getting away for a long time with just selling [circulation] numbers," he says. "Now they're selling audience quality."

Experts are in general agreement as to why newspapers are motivated to conduct high-quality research.

"Their motivations are purely to sell advertising," says Jay Cohen, exec vp and a principal with Scarborough Research Corp., New York.

"When an advertiser asks, 'How can I best reach my customers?' and 'What media, or media mix, will give me the most for my money?' they need answers," he says.

This is especially true of major national retailers, such as Sears, Roebuck & Co., K mart, J.C. Penney Co. and Montgomery Ward & Co., some of the heaviest users of newspaper advertising, says John Mennenga, senior vp-marketing research at Sawyer-Ferguson-Walker Co., New York, which represents media clients to large advertisers. These companies rely heavily on syndicated and proprietary research in major markets and mostly on proprietary research in smaller ones, he says.

As large retailers reduce their overhead costs by centralizing media buying functions, newspaper research becomes a critical factor in ad placement, Mr. Mennenga says.

> "Newspapers have been . . . just selling numbers. Now they're selling audience quality."
> Robert Rudasill
> Journal and Constitution

Media buyers need information on demographics, shopping activity, shopper mobility, competition, use of credit cards, profiles of charge card customers and a host of other factors, which research studies are designed to provide, he says.

Although big retailers may already have much of this information, it would be nearly impossible to collate for up to 300 markets, he says.

"In the old days, the local store manager bought all of the advertising. Today, centralization is moving the media buyer into more remote locations. He relies on newspaper data to give him insights into markets that he may visit only once a year."

the top 50 markets, covering demographics, consumer shopping and buying patterns, among other topics.

Previously, the two had conducted separate studies. Scarborough also conducts syndicated, multimedia studies of the top 10 markets.

One trend of the proprietary studies is a tendency to look almost as closely at product assessment as at advertising promotion, says Deanne Termini, senior vp at Belden Associates, Dallas.

For this reason, many proprietary studies are designed to generate local market statistics for retailers and market penetration and readership frequency information for editors.

"Newspapers need more attitude information to market themselves to the consumer," Ms. Termini says.

"They can no longer take for granted the fact that people will use them as their primary source of information," she says.

The Orlando Sentinel is using an annual Belden study, in addition to information generated by a large, in-house research department, to develop plans for editorial refinement, says Jim Jackson, the paper's research manager.

"We strive to produce a product that has some value to all readers," Mr. Jackson says.

By looking at demographics and paying close attention to reader reactions to questions on media usage, readership and editorial content, the Orlando Sentinal in 1984 identified two editorial areas that needed improvement: Local business news and coverage of entertainment.

> "Research can tell us where we are succeeding in reaching groups of people and where we are losing ground."
> Jim Jackson
> Orlando Sentinel

In June, 1984, the Sentinel launched a Central Florida Business tabloid appearing in Monday issues.

Five months later, it introduced Calendar, a weekly entertainment tabloid in Sunday papers designed to reach 18 to 34-year-olds.

The newspaper's circulation is booming, increasing 17% over three years to 250,000 in daily circulation and increasing 25% on Sunday to 310,000, according to the Audit Bureau of Circulations.

"Research can tell us where we are succeeding in reaching groups of people and where we are losing ground," Mr. Jackson says. "I think a lot of our success circulation-wise was due to changes in the editorial product."

But more importantly, the research permits top management to make intelligent and informed decisions that benefit and enhance the roles of the advertising and the editorial sides of the paper, Mr. Jackson says.

Computers speed up readership measurement

By Gary Levin

Advertisers have found a new technology of convenience to measure newspaper readership.

Several marketers, including General Foods and Kraft, use computerized data provided by Audit Bureau of Circulations, Schaumburg, Ill., to track circulation trends, calculate media market coverage and determine combined ad rates for several papers in a given market.

Media companies such as ABC-TV's spot sales division and Parade Sunday magazine supplement also use the measurement service.

"We literally could not function without [the service]," says Paul Black, research director at Parade, whose growing list of 282 subscribing papers made automation even more essential.

Advertisers, including AT&T Phone Centers, New York, and La-Z-Boy Chair Co., Monroe, Mich., can publish local dealer listings sorted by Zip code, Mr. Black says.

The system also can provide a fixed percentage coverage of a given market by adding buys in USA Weekend or the Metropolitan Sunday Newspaper Network to supplement shortfalls in Parade.

On-line circulation data is the same as that provided in hard-copy Audit Bureau reports. But the computer hookup enables marketers to more easily manipulate those numbers to provide rankings, cost-per-thousand calculations and other data that normally require hours of numbers-crunching.

> "In our custom reports, advertisers want to look at circulations based on their markets, not on newspaper [designated] markets."
> Cecelia Kowalski
> Audit Bureau of Circulations

All of this computer-age activity marks a significant departure from the days when marketers were dependent on hard-copy crunching and cross-tabulations. Such circulation reference books often provide year-old numbers that take hours to compile.

The on-line service has made most of that obsolete. In fact, a Parade researcher was replaced by a machine when bureau data became computerized in September, 1984.

Interactive Market Systems, Market Sciences Associates and Telmar Group, all New York-based companies, offer several on-line services for customized research tabulated from Audit Bureau of Circulations newspaper and magazine circulation tallies.

"In our custom reports, advertisers want to look at circulations based on their markets, not on newspaper [designated] markets," says Cecelia Kowalski, manager of the bureau's in-house databank service.

Areas of dominant influence, metropolitan statistical areas and Selling-Areas Marketing Inc. markets all can be used as benchmarks for such research.

Gannett pushes USA Today as tomorrow's paper

By Janet Meyers

USA Today publisher Cathleen Black is joyful.

The pride of Rosslyn, Va.-based Gannett Co., with a circulation of 1,170,559, carried its first department store ad in December—a full-page color spread of holiday gifts from Saks Fifth Avenue, New York.

In addition, ad revenue increased 67% and ad pages increased 44%, to 3,375, in 1985.

However, all is not rosy for USA Today.

The paper's ad rates are below many competing national papers. For example, cost per thousand for a full-page b&w ad in the Wall Street Journal is about $4,315, compared with $1,917 in USA Today, and the Gannett paper continues to discount thousands of subscriptions to build circulation. Also, USA Today, available in 90% of the country, may have difficulty gaining new readers this year because few new markets remain, newspaper analysts say.

In 1986, the nationally distributed paper will spend about $4 million, a quarter of its first-year, 1983, budget, on trade and consumer advertising. USA Today recently began reaping the benefits of its tv, print and radio campaign launched in the spring of 1984 via Lois Pitts Gershon Pon/GGK, New York, says Ms. Black, publisher since October, 1983.

However, according to industry observers, increased ad revenues and ad pages are the direct result of Ms. Black's efforts on the road.

"It's been an unrelenting public relations campaign as much as anything else," says Bruce Thorp, newspaper analyst with John Morton & Co., Washington. Gannett's flagship promotes circulation through free tie-ins with other companies.

For example, Neiman-Marcus, the Dallas-based department store chain, carried a USA Today subscription card in its winter catalog. In June, Gannett teamed with General Mills for a promotion offering consumers free six-month subscriptions to USA Today. The promotion netted 450,000 new, but unpaid, subscribers.

"We have to work harder," Ms. Black says. "We're not the Wall Street Journal. We're not sold out for the next three months."

In the beginning, the newspaper failed in its quest for advertisers, Ms. Black says. Advertising, via Young & Rubicam, New York, listed the newspaper's demographic and circulation figures and urged media buyers to take a chance.

When the account went to Lois Pitts, the paper introduced the theme "The advertising might of USA Today." In 1984, ads appeared on the back page of each section of the New York Times.

USA Today's colorful mixture of trivia and simple writing earned it the nickname of "McPaper," for serving up not necessarily the most news of the day, but tastes of the most interesting topics for an audience reared on tv.

The Leader.

In some markets, newspapers may play a game of "Circulation Hopscotch", trading the lead back and forth with a special gimmick or a super offer.

But in the Sacramento market – the nation's 20th ADI – the game is "Follow the Leader", and the leader is The Sacramento Bee.

The Bee has stretched its circulation lead over the market's second-place paper to more than 2-to-1. That translates into a daily lead of 131,879 and a whopping 169,415 margin on Sundays.

During the coming year, we plan to continue our commitment to make The Bee the very best newspaper we can – editorially and technologically – and to continue to earn our leadership position in the dynamic Sacramento market.

The personality pitch

If comedian Bill Cosby can sell Jell-O, then "Dynasty" star Joan Collins should be able to hawk newspapers.

That's the reasoning behind Lois Pitts Gerson Pon/GGK's yearlong tv campaign for USA Today. George Lois, chairman and creative director, says he's believed in the power of personality endorsements for years. He chose the tv celebrity strategy so he could settle the question of who reads the 3-year-old national newspaper.

It's people like former Chicago Mayor Jayne Byrne, former Sen. Howard Baker, and baseball greats Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays who read USA Today, he says.

The Gannett Co. newspaper intends to keep its personality-rich campaign for a while. However, other newspapers have tried that method but dropped it for other tactics.

In April, Newsday used "Kojak" star Telly Savalas and New York Mets catcher Gary Carter in a tv campaign targeting Queens residents who favor New York newspapers.

Mr. Savalas promoted the new edition of the Long Island daily by touring his old Greek neighborhood in Queens. "Kojak was again becoming a hot character," says Burton Zelner, exec vp with Van Brunt & Co., New York, which handled the assignment. "Savalas was getting a lot of press back then."

The agency chose Mr. Carter because it also wanted to promote Newsday's sports section. "The Mets play in Shea Stadium, which is in Queens," Mr. Zelner says.

Newsday more than reached its goal of selling 75,000 copies to Queens readers after the two-month campaign, he says. The Newsday account now is handled by Boston-based Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, which no longer uses personalities.

The Chicago Sun-Times, faced with an image problem after its purchase by Rupert Murdoch, decided to make stars of its writers in advertising launched in October.

The theme of the tv, radio and print campaign from Campbell-Mithun, Chicago is "Take an expert with you. Take the Chicago Sun-Times." Four 30-second tv spots feature Roger Ebert, the newspaper's movie critic; Ron Rapoport sports columnist; Basil Talbott Jr., political editor, and Andy Yemma, financial editor.

"We wanted to tout their strength, their reporters and writers," Al Puccinelli, senior vp at C-M, says of the Sun-Times. "People were concerned what would happen with the paper after Murdoch bought it."

The Detroit News, which has a tough competitor in the Free Press, is using former Tigers pitcher Bill Slayback in one of its tv spots promoting the News' sports section and morning delivery.

Fred Yaffe, chairman of Yaffe Berline, the Southfield, Mich., agency handling the campaign, says he asked a talent search company to find a baseball player who looked like Robert Redford in "The Natural." They got Mr. Slayback, who's now ballplayer turned actor. —J.M.

Tomorrow's newspaper

try doesn't remember life before television," Ms. Black says. "George Lois is very visual. One of the first ads had a vending machine and pointed out its similarity to a tv screen. It gave substance to critics calling us McPaper. We're saying, in fact we are a newspaper, but we're designed for this generation."

Most USA Today readers earn more than $35,000 a year and are 24 to 55 years old—in short, the population coveted by advertisers, according to Lee Guittar, USA Today's president.

"Agencies are notorious for not accepting new ideas," Mr. Lois says. "I lived through MTV [another Lois Pitts client] too."

Advertising for such a new media vehicle as USA Today had to reflect the newspaper, he says. He got the account after he told Ms. Black, "You've got an exciting paper and you're running dull ads. The advertising certainly should be as interesting as the paper."

One of his trade ads showed a weird-looking creature and was headlined, "A lot of media people are saying USA Today is neither fish nor fowl. They're right." The ad admitted the newspaper fell into no category, and closed, "We don't care much what you call us, just as long as you call us."

Celebrities sell advertisers on who reads USA Today.

However, research showed that the bolder print ads in trade magazines and the New York Times attracted top-level executives, but not midlevel people who do the buying.

Subsequently, to reach younger media buyers, USA Today advertised on tv, Mr. Lois says. Spots aired in select markets during late news and early morning slots most likely to be seen by agency and company executives.

"The guy sitting behind a desk flipping through U.S. News may sell circulation for some magazines, but at USA Today we felt strongly we should go beyond that," Ms. Black says. In August, celebrities were featured in the tv ads, one for each of the paper's sections. Bill Marriott, president of Marriott Corp., endorsed business; Joe and Debbie Namath promoted the popular sports section, actress Joan Collins endorsed the Life section and former Sen. Howard Baker, the hard news.

"The second we did that, the people at the agencies knew that the important people read it," Mr. Lois says. In 1985, trade ads were headlined, "Because it works, works, works. They keep coming back for more, more, more!" Larger advertisers were cited by name, such as International Business Machines, which bought seven ad pages in 1984 and 50 in 1985, Ms. Black says.

In August, consumer ads had different celebrities, like former Chicago Mayor Jane Byrne, and tv personality Willard Scott, singing, "I read it every day."

Later that month, the newspaper increased its price to 50 cents from 35 cents. "We wanted to buffet any possible loss in circulation," Mr. Lois says.

However, despite positive year-to-year figures, USA Today's circulation is disappointing, Mr. Thorp says.

The newspaper projected a 2 million circulation by the time it turns a profit, anticipated in 1987, but has achieved its current 1.3 million subscribers largely by introduction in new markets, he says.

"It'll be hard to get past that initial segment of readers. Our projections for circulation revenue have been scaled back," Mr. Thorp says. "Maybe advertising revenue will make up for lower circulation revenue. It's ad revenue that will make it profitable."

This month the paper moved to a 56-page capacity. Each week it will carry a special insert devoted to one topic. The first four will focus on health, finance, the Super Bowl and corporate America.

"Obviously it's a way to bring in new advertisers," Ms. Black says. The 12-page sections will include five to seven ad pages.

"It's a big plate for us," she says. "Some will be more successful than others, like those where we have a strong advertising base anyway." Ad rates in the special sections will be 10% to 15% higher than in the regular paper, she says. The paper's most frequent advertisers are automotive companies, travel-related businesses, computers and office equipment, and business and consumer services.

USA Today's promotion direction will remain the same in 1986, she says. "We're toying with buying more spectacular units, like taking four pages to gang it up a little," she says. It's precisely the same advice the newspaper's sales force often gives to advertisers about buying in USA Today.

People Who Run Things In The Twin Cities Read The Star And Tribune.

When you run advertising in the Minneapolis Star and Tribune, you reach an upscale audience that includes an extremely large number of managers and other professionals.

Although we are the 13th largest ADI, Minneapolis-St. Paul ranks 8th in percent composition of Managerial-Professionals, 7th in college graduates, and 7th in household incomes over $50,000.

And a Twin Cities newspaper buy, anchored by the Star and Tribune, lets you reach a high percentage of these upper income readers at one of the most efficient CPMs in the country.

In fact, the Twin Cities rank 5th among the 20 largest ADIs in newspaper cost-per-thousand delivery of this group.

London broadsheets target professionals

By Sean Milmo

In a crowded pool of tawdry tabloids, London's four broadsheets promote their products in the hopes of capturing an upscale, professional reader.

To compete in the London newspaper market, the Times, a News International paper; the Guardian, published by Guardian & Manchester Evening News PLC, and the Pearson Group-owned Financial Times have moved into advertising and marketing in an aggressive way.

Meanwhile, the Daily Telegraph has demonstrated that lack of marketing support can prove detrimental in today's newspaper market.

Since 1979, the Daily Telegraph's circulation has decreased by about 15%, 3% of that in the last year, to 1.21 million. However, over the past five years, the Times has increased circulation about 30%, to 475,707, and the Guardian by 23%, to 480,697. The Financial Times, a business publication, has a circulation of 230,981, a 7% increase from the previous year's figure.

During 1985, the Telegraph invested in new computerized printing technology to cut costs.

Despite this effort, the paper ran into cash flow problems and subsequently was rescued from bankruptcy by Canadian financier Conrad Black, head of Toronto Argus Corp. In December, the company took control of the Telegraph from the Berry family, owners since 1927.

Industry observers expect the paper to be much more active in marketing under Mr. Black, who brought in Economist editor Andrew Knight as chief executive. Although the paper has a lot of circulation ground to make up, it is by far the leader among London broadsheets.

In 1984, after years of promotional inertia, the Telegraph broke a $3.47 million campaign handled by Dorland Advertising, London, which is still running. Using the tag line "Hard news, infernal crossword," the campaign touted the paper's solid news coverage mixed with lighthearted, intellectual material.

But for the most part, the Telegraph has not gotten its marketing act together, competitors say.

"They don't appear even to have gotten down to basics, like finding out about their market and what people perceive as being their strong points," says an executive at one rival paper, who would not speak for attribution.

"In particular they have failed to bring in new, younger readers. Their readership is literally dying," he says.

But while only 25% of the Daily Telegraph's readership is younger than 35, 45% of the Guardian's and 40% of the Times' readers are, according to Grandfield Rork Collins, a London-based ad agency.

Portfolio, a bingo-type game, is the main promotional tool for luring additional, mostly young readers to the Times. Since the game's introduction in June, 1984, the paper estimates Portfolio has helped boost circulation about 100,000, says Julie Ferguson, ad services manager for the Times.

"The objective was to draw attention to the paper's business news section, which had been greatly improved," she says, referring to the section's new editorial staff. "Unlike other bingo-style promotions, it has not been a flash in the pan with circulation falling off after an initial success."

Marketing executives at the Guardian have dismissed Portfolio as a gimmick. Rather than counter with a contest of its own, the paper has concentrated on an image-building tv and print campaign.

"We've tried to get away from the building block approach to increasing newspaper sales," says Guardian marketing manager Jon Gordon. "This is based upon the idea that newspaper readers consist of groups of people with minority interests. All you have to do is cover someone's specific interest and you've gained a reader.

"We believe that people buy a paper for its over-all qualities—its political stance, the way its articles are written, its style. It is those sort of intangibles which our advertising is designed to promote."

The paper's main campaign during 1985, through London-based Boase Massimi Pollitt, was a series of commercials in which personalities, such as former Times editor Harold Evans, actor Peter Ustinov and Irish novelist Edna O'Brien, explain why the Guardian is their favorite paper. The campaign will continue running in 1986.

In one spot that no longer is running, Mr. Evans, who left the Times after clashing with News Group Ltd. president Rupert

Sean Milmo is a London-based free-lancer.

Murdoch, claims to like the Guardian because no one tells it what to say.

The left-of-center paper, owned by a trust and unaligned to any political party, makes a great play of its political and commercial independence.

"At a time when so much of the U.K. press is owned by multinationals with domineering proprietors, our independence is not only becoming more widely known but actually appreciated," Mr. Gordon says.

> "We wanted to get across that the paper is less predictable . . . than our competitors."
> Jenny Beck
> Observer

Also, the Guardian has had success in bolstering its recruitment, or help-wanted classified, advertising. Like other newspapers, the Guardian sees this category as an important means of increasing ad revenue as well as circulation.

But the Guardian is not alone in its brand-building method of advertising.

The Sunday-only Observer, owned by Lonrho PLC, London, one of the country's three broadsheet Sunday papers along with the Sunday Times and the Sunday Telegraph, has been running a tv spot through J. Walter Thompson with the tag line, "Do something different every Sunday, read the Observer."

"We wanted to get across that the paper is less predictable, more exciting and varied than our competitors," says Jenny Beck, marketing and circulation controller for the Observer. "Rather than running ads telling people what's in the paper this week, we are aiming to generate a long-term image for the paper."

Also stressing brand image is the Financial Times.

Since 1982, an ongoing tv campaign has combined content advertising with branding. The slogan, created by Ogilvy & Mather, London, "No FT . . . no comment," also has been repeated in poster advertising.

"The commercials aim to broaden the readership of the paper by highlighting specific articles on subjects not normally associated with it, like technology and managerial techniques," says Mark Knight, pr manager for the Financial Times.

"The message is that if a businessman wants to be well informed he must read the Financial Times. It's an image-building exercise rather than traditional newspaper advertising about what is in the paper tomorrow."

Bay Area dailies spending time on tv

By Betsy Gilbert

The San Francisco Bay Area is fertile ground for the newspaper trade. Dailies and weeklies cater to almost every group living in this cultural melting pot. However, three newspapers stand out, and those three recently implemented aggressive marketing strategies in an effort to capture a larger share of the pot.

You could spend the rest of your days trying to find three more diverse daily newspapers than the San Francisco Chronicle, San Francisco Examiner and San Jose Mercury News. These papers' promoters spend their days trying to establish individual images in the minds of potential readers. It's difficult to turn on a tv without seeing one of the papers being promoted in slick commercials.

"This is something that's relatively new, not just for the Bay Area, but around the country," says Jessie Knight, vp-marketing for the San Francisco Newspaper Agency, which operates business functions for the Chronicle, with a morning circulation of 545,622, and the Examiner, with an evening circulation of 142,314.

"Metropolitan dailies are buying a lot of television time projecting their corporate images. It's no secret that newspapers have been somewhat diluted [as an advertising medium] over time by tv and radio. I'm trying to bring these newspapers back as a strong force, as strong as they were in their heydays."

That effort, for the San Francisco papers as well as the Mercury News, which has a daily circulation of 261,668, is taking the form of direct appeals to consumers where they can be found most often—in front of their tv sets. High-quality commercials, some of them creating a short movie in a 30-second time frame, are succeeding in gaining reader attention.

"I think all of these papers have separate identities and appeal to a certain kind of audience, but all of them are trying to boost circulation and they're all going at it very aggressively," Mr. Knight says.

Mr. Knight, who wears two hats in his task of marketing the Chronicle and Examiner, was presented with a major challenge when he took the newspaper agency job in May. The Examiner, an afternoon paper that had not been setting the world on fire, had a new publisher in William Randolph Hearst III. The 36-year-old grandson of the newspaper dynasty's founder had some new ideas for running the predictable Examiner, and Mr. Knight saw a way to get those ideas across to the public: Tv advertising. Subsequently, the paper's most recent ad campaign, "The New Generation," was born.

"We sat down and decided that our biggest priority was establishing a separate identity for the Examiner," Mr. Knight says. "We needed to extricate it from the aura of the Chronicle and announce that there were all these positive new things going on. We figured the best way to get that message across was through the use of personalities."

The agency, San Francisco-based Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, developed a black-and-white series of 30-second commercials around the new personalities on the paper, including Mr. Hearst, columnists Hunter Thompson and Cyra McFadden. Film buffs immediately recognized overtones from the film classic "Citizen Kane," based on the times of William Randolph Hearst.

"The idea behind the ads was to produce little serials, an ongoing story of what is going on at the paper," says Rebecca Holder, director-account services and a principal in Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein.

"The 'Citizen Kane' angle occurred to all of us."

The spots became a topic of general conversation and, more to the point, they got people thinking a little differently about the Examiner.

"The ads focused attention on the Examiner, but the paper itself is what brings in the readers, Mr. Knight says. "You compare the Examiner today to what it was a year ago, and you're going to see some marked changes, positive changes."

Editorial content is lighter with an edge of humor, compared with the weighty, serious tone of the past, he says.

David Rosenthal, a tv critic for the San Jose Mercury News, says that while the use of personalities in the Examiner's current campaign is clever, he's not sure it's going to get the desired result, which is to appeal to a broader range of readers.

"Basically, the message is: 'If you are intrigued by Hunter Thompson or Cyra McFadden or Warren Hinkle, well they write for us now,'" he says. "I don't know that that is going to sell a lot of papers."

While results of the Examiner's campaign have yet to be determined, the Bay Area's leading newspaper has embarked on an ad campaign of its own.

"A lot of people have asked me if the current television commercials on the Chronicle are a result of the Examiner campaign's success," Mr. Knight says. "They're not. The two papers' ad campaigns were planned at the same time, looking at separate marketing problems and separate strategies."

The Mercury News emphasizes its broad coverage in ads and spots.

Because the Chronicle is the area's dominant newspaper, promoting it was not a matter of trying to uplift an underdog. Mr. Knight wanted to highlight the paper's strengths, rather than use a discount subscription offer. He worked closely with the San Francisco advertising agency Gardner Communications in developing that message.

"The Chronicle had never done a corporate campaign in its history and we—Jessie and my staff—agree that a good strong corporate image was what we needed to portray," says Bob Gardner, founder of the agency.

"The research we conducted showed that because all previous advertising had been offering discounts, people perceived the paper as being in some kind of trouble. We needed to go in an entirely different direction to counteract that image," he says.

"We weren't looking at the same catalyst of events as at the Examiner, such as Will Hearst taking over, new columnists being brought in," Mr. Gardner says. "Because the paper leads the Examiner about five to one, we didn't need a lot of bells and whistles. What we wanted to do was reinforce the public's positive image of the Chronicle as the paper of record for the Bay Area."

The approach chosen was a dialog campaign of unscripted, unrehearsed spots done by a number of local personalities, including singer Boz Scaggs. They were all interviewed in man-on-the-street segments and gave positive impressions of the Chronicle in their own words. The tag line was "Great place. Great paper."

"We set unusual criteria for signing up the personalities we used," Mr. Gardner says. "The standard approach in something like this is to get a John Madden or a Joe Montana—people who do a lot of commercials. We decided to go with what we call testimonial virgins, people who are recognizable, but who've never done commercials before. At first, there was some resistance, but now we're getting calls and letters from people who want to be a part of the campaign."

A commercial with a more serious tone also has been running on local tv. "It's the anchor commercial," Mr. Gardner says. Several of the testimonial personalities make cameo appearances in the spot, which points up the Chronicle's strengths as a leading newspaper.

The Chronicle plans to continue the "Great place. Great paper" campaign indefinitely, and while the testimonials will be used, the personalities will change, he says.

"We found an approach that works, and we agree with Jessie Knight that we ought to keep it for as long as it continues to work," Mr. Gardner says.

That's an attitude shared by the marketing experts at the San Jose Mercury News, whose ads, with the tag line "The Bay Area's Best," have been touting the newspaper's corporate strengths on tv for more than four years.

"Our entire market approach for the past several years has been product based," says Tim Aldrich, director-consumer marketing for the newspaper. "It's different from what the San Francisco papers have traditionally done, but we felt that it was the right approach for us because we really do have the best newspaper in the Bay Area."

The Mercury News promotions are based on research that identified psychographic, rather than demographic, target audiences, Mr. Aldrich says. Spots promoting international news are aimed at one group, segments promoting business coverage at another.

"This is an approach that we've found extremely successful over the years, and it's something we plan to stick with," Mr. Aldrich says. "We've never done two-for-one discount ads, and it's not likely that we ever will. Our strength is the product, the newspaper, and that's the message we try to get across to the public."

The message will stay the same, but the paper's approach will change. "The Bay Area's Best" campaign, done by McCann-Erickson, San Francisco, is being replaced by a series based on the Mercury News' broad coverage. In December, "Entertainment—we're all over it" and "News—we're all over it" tv spots, created by Mr. Aldrich's in-house staff, began touting the corporate strength of the San Jose paper.

New York papers playing the numbers game

By Cara S. Trager

Metropolitan New York's four major dailies are sharpening their editorial products and marketing swords in an effort to win distribution and circulation gains.

The Big Apple represents a highly charged, competitive market in which formidable media giants are battling for the New York newspaper reader.

Tribune Co.'s New York Daily News, News America Publishing's New York Post and Times Mirror Co.'s Newsday recently redesigned their marketing and advertising strategies with one goal in mind: Market dominance. Armed with special pullouts and new and expanded features, New York's major papers are playing for numbers —as in readers and advertisers.

Against this background, the New York Times Co.'s flagship marches to the beat of a different drummer. The paper has a daily circulation of 963,365, an increase of 3% from the previous year's figure, and a slight increase on Sunday, to 1,572,498. But unlike the other three dailies, which are eager to appeal to a broad-based audience, the New York Times is more concerned with the quality, rather than quantity, of its circulation.

The Times' editorial and marketing efforts are aimed at developing and maintaining a firm grasp on its well-heeled and well-educated reader, the professional or manager with a college degree and a median family income of $35,000 in Manhattan, $50,000 elsewhere, according to Len Harris, director-corporate relations.

> "We are expanding circulation on a very controlled basis . . . . We look for staying power."
> Len Harris
> New York Times

Although expansion of circulation outside the metropolitan New York area is a goal, the Times' interest is purely demographic, not geographic, as it wants upper-end readers, says Jim Cutie, director-marketing and promotion.

"We are expanding circulation on a very controlled basis, not for one day or one headline, but about 2% a year. We look for staying power," Mr. Harris says.

The Times promotes the paper through home delivery sampling and advertises with direct mail, which accounts for about 20% of its media mix, and morning and evening drive-time radio, which represents about 80% of its ad expenditures.

"Find Your World in Ours" is the paper's consumer ad campaign that attempts to attract the upscale reader by emphasizing the quality of the paper's national, international and business reporting, says Dorothy Abrahams, vp-account supervisor at Bozell & Jacobs, New York, which handles the account.

In an effort to build and maintain readers who fit the Times demographic mold, the paper continues to add sections and features suited to the needs and interests of these readers. For example, the paper, which started computer coverage in Tuesday's Science Times in 1982, launched regular computer coverage in its Sunday business section in January, 1985. Also, it has stepped up its single-topic Part II Sunday magazine sections to include Sports, the Sophisticated Traveler and World of New York, which examines the pleasures of life in the city.

New York Newsday since 1983 also has stepped up its number of pullouts, but the paper's most pronounced, recent efforts have been in city reporting. The 2½-year-old New York Newsday, determined to become a dominant player in the city, is increasing its distribution in Newsday's market research efforts, which include telephone surveys and focus groups, reveal that its Long Island image isn't going to change overnight. But New York Newsday is determined to change that perception.

About 120 writers, editors and photographers work exclusively on the New York edition, and another 25 will be added this year, says David Laventhol, senior vp for Times Mirror Corp. and Newsday's chairman. The net result is a product that boasts a city-oriented front page and, inside, news and features focusing on issues, events and business relevant to Big Apple residents, he says.

In April, based upon market research, the paper decreased its cover price from 30 cents to an introductory 20 cents "to get people to pick it up," Mr. Laventhol says. Earlier this month, Newsday increased its New York edition cover price to 25 cents. "Twenty cents is quite low in this market and was used as part of our marketing strategy. We don't feel we'll lose our readers to any significant extent because of the price increase," he says.

Through its editorial efforts and pricing strategy, Newsday, as of November, has reached a circulation of 82,000 in New York, an increase of 37,000 from April, according to Mr. Laventhol. By yearend, circulation is expected to reach 85,000, he ssays.

"That's relatively small by New York's standard, and most of it, 70,000, is in Queens, but that's not a negative," the publisher says. "The key word with us is incremental. We are in no rush and have no magic date to hit a magic circulation number. We want to do it right, and we expect it to take people a long time to change their reading habits. We are in New York for the long haul and expect to be fully competitive with other newspapers."

Media analysts say there's merit in the paper's incremental strategy. "If you can practice in Queens and leverage off your recognition while still developing your reporting, you can take your editorial product and gradually move into New York," says John L. Bauer, media analyst with Oppenheimer & Co., New York. "Queens is going to give them strength."

In 1986, as part of its long-term plans to gain city readership, the paper thus far has allocated about $2.5 million in media spending, a 25% increase from 1985, says Jack Squire, promotion director. Tv represents about 50% of its expenditures, with the remaining dollars spent on morning radio, outdoor boards and transit.

Newsday's most recent tv campaign, which began in September and ran for three months, featured an aerial view of the Manhattan skyline with the tag line, "We're taking New York head-on. There's more New York in Newsday."

Although the paper has had little effect on competition, its efforts have not gone unnoticed. "We view Newsday as a serious competitor and newspaper, which is extremely well-financed," says John Dunleavy, assistant to the publisher at the Daily News. "To date, however, it's had little effect on the Daily News, despite its price reduction. Their effect on both our advertising and circulation has been minimal."

Nevertheless, the News is not idle. The paper, which views itself as broad-based, recently introduced revisions and redesigns in its editorial product. For example, more and larger photographs have been added and two typefaces have been introduced.

In addition, the News has expanded its daily sports section by six pages, bringing total sports coverage to an average 16 to 20 pages a day.

The New York Times' marketing efforts are aimed at attracting well-heeled, well-educated readers.

"New York is a tremendous sports town. It's not an incidental section," Mr. Dunleavy says. Business coverage also has been enlarged to include a Tuesday business section and a Money Talks pullout, which offers Sunday readers business news and information.

Newspaper analyst John Morton of Lynch Jones Ryan in New York says the paper is acting defensively.

"What's been going on is that the Daily News is trying to hold the middle-ground against suburban Newsday's foray into the city, particularly in Queens," he says.

The paper's most recent campaign positions the News as a bona fide New York product. Its ad campaign, introduced in June, carries the tag line, "New York's hometown paper."

"The New York Times is the national paper of record, Newsday is not a New York paper yet and the Post is a foreigner-owned tabloid," says Jim Callaway, president New York-based Holland & Callaway, the News' agency. "The Daily News is down home."

TV represents the primary thrust of the paper's advertising expenditures, with outdoor boards and radio accounting for the remainder. Executives declined to reveal ad spending but anticipate the budget for 1986 to be about the same as last year.

Admittedly, the bottom line is circulation. Although the News' daily figure increased slightly from 1984 to 1,353,156 in 1985, Sunday circulation was down 59,415 from the previous year, to 1,662,026.

In the past, the News has relied upon contests to attract new readers and boost circulation.

"Contests always are beneficial in giving a temporary hike to circulation and introducing new readership to the product," he says. "However, at some point, the needle has to be withdrawn, and the fact which sells the paper in the long-term is a good, solid readable product."

To increase circulation, the paper is focusing more of its attention on Manhattan, adding several hundred outlets to its distribution system; tripling the number of street vending machines, and stepping up its home delivery program.

Despite these efforts, the paper anticipates a loss in circulation because it raised its weekday cover price last October from 30 cents to 35 cents, says Allan Talbot, director-planning. He expects circulation to return to pre-price increase levels by early 1987.

Also casting hungry eyes on the New York reader is the Post. The Post, long known for its bold and dramatic front-page headlines, is attempting to change that image, the News' Mr. Dunleavy says. "The Post is a moving target right now that was easier to describe a year ago. Today, it's trying to become more respectable; there's not quite the screech to the headlines, and we're seeing a lot more effort to introduce readers to commentary."

Post executives concur. "We're out to attract a younger audience, who spends all the money it makes, is educated and upwardly mobile and looking for life-style opportunities," says Tom Kennedy, advertising director.

To that end, the paper last August added a special City People section and also stepped up its sports and business coverage through special pullouts.

Like the News, the Post has attempted to boost circulation through contests, particularly its Wingo game, which ended last July after five years.

"The original goal was to increase circulation by bringing more people into the paper, and it was very successful in the beginning," says Roderick Welch, the Post's director-circulation. "Last spring, we decided to let the circulation settle where it may." As a result, circulation declined 13.6%, to 803,955 in 1985. "Wingo was hype, and we are happy with what we got, and now that we see where our circulation is, we will make other decisions to increase it again," says Mr. Welch, who would not discuss plans.

The Daily News bills itself as New York's hometown newspaper in a campaign from New York-based agency Holland & Callaway.

Post executives also attribute the circulation decline to the paper's cover price, which increased from 30 cents to 35 cents in October, 1984.

Although the higher price ultimately affected circulation, the Post's Mr. Kennedy indicated that it represented a competitive edge in selling advertisers. "The advantage is that readers weren't buying the paper out of cheapness but [because it was] something they wanted to read."

But with circulation being the name of the game, a new consumer advertising campaign is in the works, although the company declined to elaborate.

As the battle for readers, and ultimately, advertisers, rages on in the Big Apple, the competing dailies can find comfort in the fact that there's a strong possibility there will be more than one victor.

Promotion is weapon in Dallas circulation war

By Susan Garland

The Dallas newspaper market has proved to be an arena of colorful battles between its two daily newspapers, the Dallas Morning News and the Dallas Times Herald.

In 1985, the News, owned by A.H. Belo Corp., scored a victory as the paper's daily circulation increased 4.9% from the previous year, to 377,843, and garnered about 62% market share. This gives the News a substantial lead over Times Mirror Co.-owned Times Herald, which has a circulation of 231,224, a 14.6% decrease from the similar period a year earlier.

Dallas is the only market to list two papers in the top 10 U.S. newspapers in full-run ad linage. For the first eight months of 1985, the News is ranked No. 1 and the Times Herald is No. 8, according to Media Records.

The marketing battle between the two is often as fierce as the circulation struggle.

"In terms of circulation, Dallas is a more promotional type of market," says Barry Kaplan, a publishing analyst at Bear, Stearns in New York. "This is partly because of the competition and partly because you've got two very smart effective marketers competing against each other. Both are knocking heads from a promotional standpoint."

In 1977, when the Times Herald, previously an afternoon paper, published its first morning edition, competition escalated.

At that time, both newspapers began investing heavily in marketing support. The Morning News retained Yankelovich, Skelly & White, New York, to conduct a profile study of the Dallas market. Based on the report, the News stepped up its coverage of business, sports, fashion, arts and entertainment, and local news. The Yankelovich study was repeated in 1981 and 1983.

"We made a long-term commitment to improve the product," says Jeremy Halbreich, Morning News exec vp. "In close coordination with that commitment, we've mounted aggressive advertising sales efforts and year-round circulation solicitation."

And that effort appears to have paid. "Judging from circulation numbers, the News has quite obviously conducted an effective program, not just in marketing but in product improvement," says Bruce Thorp, media analyst for John Morton Co., New York. "The Times Herald has worked very hard to improve the appeal of its paper to the reader, but so far those efforts haven't paid off as well as they have at the News."

A multimedia campaign supported Blackie Sherrod's move to the Dallas Morning News.

The Morning News is oriented toward providing what the market perceives as a quality product, Mr. Kaplan says. "The Times Herald has made some product changes too, but most of that is a competitive response to what the News already has done."

But the Times Herald hasn't been without its own marketing studies. In 1985, it commissioned a market study by Urban & Associates, Sharon, Mass. "There are amazing reasons for why you are read," says Laurie Walton, Times Herald vp-promotions.

"You can't hang your hat on any one thing and be safe. You have to have appeal without fragmentation. We're isolating those areas with greatest impact and potential for growth," Ms. Walton says.

"In the Chris Urban study, readers were asked to rank the newspapers over-all on a scale from 0 to 100 and both newspapers ranked in the low 90s," says Arthur Wible, Times Herald's publisher. "In markets not as competitive as Dallas, you don't get such a high ranking. This shows that our environment is one of growth and it provides both papers enough room to improve and grow."

The Times Herald kept itself visible during 1985, beginning the year with a continuation of the popular "What does the Herald say?" campaign and the use of a classified ad phone number jingle. The introduction of new sections and features, including an expanded business section, the Sunday magazine and an in-depth news section, was promoted by using the date, Sunday, May 5. The product improvements were supported with heavy tv, radio and outdoor advertising, Ms. Walton says.

Tv spots to announce the return of a local columnist to the newspaper and the debut of USA Weekend in the Herald, and a revised jingle rounded out the Times Herald's broadcast year. "We'll continue multimedia exposure in 1986," Ms. Walton says.

"The Times Herald recognizes Dallas is a rural, sophisticated city that likes to have a good time and has a sense of humor," says Dave Campbell, group supervisor with the Dallas-based Richards Group, the paper's agency since 1977. "A lot of our [future] advertising and other communication will address that perspective," he says.

In January, 1985, the News began a multimedia campaign focusing on its newest addition to its staff, veteran Herald sports columnist Blackie Sherrod. Tv, radio, outdoor and direct mail supported "The Move" of Mr. Sherrod, who had worked 26 years of his 35-year career at the Herald. The campaign was designed to recruit Times Herald readers and non-newspaper readers.

Sunday, May 5, was the debut of special sections and features in the Dallas Times Herald.

In May, the News selected Tracy-Locke, Dallas, to handle its advertising after the Dallas office of Cunningham & Walsh, the paper's previous agency, closed that month. Because the News was left with an unusable, unfinished tv campaign after the switch, the paper refrained from any tv advertising the remainder of the year. This year, the News returns to tv and devotes equal spending between it and radio, according to Harold Gaar, News vp-marketing. Two tv spots introduced earlier this month promote image while the hard-sell subscription push is left to radio.

"The campaign officially begins February and runs for six weeks, followed by advertising tracking and then another flight of ads," says Scott Helbing, vp-management supervisor at Tracy-Locke.

To further promote themselves, both papers spend actively on cultural, athletic and community events.

"Public relations fits into the marketing objective, as does the sports, business or local news emphasis—it all comes out of the long-term commitment," the News' Mr. Gaar says. The News sponsors different business seminars and functions, races, ama-

Dailies mining Florida's Gold Coast

By Mark Schwed

If the moon's over Miami, the sun is shining off Florida's Gold Coast. North of Miami, in Dade, Broward and Palm Beach counties, the population is booming and the area has become a battleground for the daily newspapers.

"It's war there," says Fred Barger, Herald circulation manager.

Since 1975, Miami's growth has slowed, not in keeping with Florida market tradition. In 1980, Miami's population was at 1.6 million, of which 36% was Hispanic, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

While population increased slightly to about 1.7 million as of April, 1985, the Hispanic population increased to 41%, according to estimates by the metropolitan Dade County planning department.

Because of that slow growth in Miami, the Herald turned to aggressive marketing in the area known as Florida's Gold Coast.

In 1985, combined population in Dade, Broward and Palm Beach counties is estimated at 3,595,524, according to the University of Florida. That figure is expected to increase 12.2% by 1990 and 30.9% by 2000, according to university projections.

However, in competing off home turf, Knight-Ridder Newspapers' flagship is faced with competition from the Fort Lauderdale News and Sun-Sentinel and the Palm Beach Post and Evening Times, each looking for a larger chunk of the steadily growing Gold Coast pie.

In 1985, Tribune Co.'s Fort Lauderdale News and Sun-Sentinel had a combined daily circulation of 196,249, a 7% increase from the previous year's figure, while the Palm Beach Newspapers, owned by Cox Enterprises, showed a combined circulation of 122,596, a 2.9% increase from 1984.

The Herald, which has a circulation of 421,679, a 0.5% increase from 1984, markets itself as "Florida's Newspaper," promoting its 16 world bureaus, national and regional coverage.

Most of the Herald's estimated $800,000 ad budget is spent on broadcast advertising, says Hank Goldberg, management supervisor at Beber Silverstein & Partners, Miami, the paper's agency.

In its tv campaign, which began in 1984, the Herald pushes its 800 telephone number to boost home delivery subscriptions and a "Find your one in a Million" campaign to push classifieds.

"The idea is with a million readers a day you can find any prospect for the product and vice versa," Mr. Goldberg says.

The Herald also used a "Catch the Herald" campaign, which dumps free newspapers on readers' heads to show how much they can save through home delivery.

Also, in November, the Herald aired tv spots during local news breaks to promote its 75th anniversary in December.

The spots featured a man reminiscing about events in Miami's past that the Herald covered.

But while the Herald promotes a broad-based distribution and a humorous approach to advertising, the Fort Lauderdale News and Sun-Sentinel work the local beat with a vengeance.

"Our philosophy is we want to publish a complete newspaper, but more importantly, we want to be the best local news provider in our market," says Robert Plaisted, vp-marketing for News & Sun-Sentinel Co. The News and Sun-Sentinel consumer campaign takes a more serious tact.

"Our campaign is 'It's Required Reading,'" says Stan Harris, creative partner at Steve Walker & Associates, which handles the News and Sun-Sen-

A research director talks to media planners about the most desirable newspaper audience.
NORTHERN NEW JERSEY'S NEWSPAPER
I've found an ideal newspaper audience, and thought you should know about it. They're bright, high-income home owners who are trend-starters — and I found them reading The Record in Northern New Jersey.
Record readers have the second highest median individual employment income ($25,400) of any daily paper in America, in a marketplace ranking 16th in total Suburban Effective Buying Income and 7th in Median Household EBI. In fact, almost 52 percent of Bergen/Passaic households have EBI's of $30,000+ compared with 39 percent nationally.
The total audience of 434,500 readers daily and 558,600 Sunday is 40 percent age 25–44, 67 percent married, 49 percent college educated, 43 percent white collar employed and 80 percent own their own homes (where most of them enjoy home delivered Record subscriptions). And, Bergen/Passaic counties are in a market that spends $9.1 billion at retail, a figure that's expected to grow to $13.2 billion in five years.
Record readers are the kind of people who willingly accept new ideas and spread them widely. That's the kind of audience that can have dramatic impact when we launch new campaigns for our clients, and when we introduce new products.
One more thing — The Record is a full-color newspaper, where we can get extra impact and readership of our ads, in an editorial environment that is trusted by readers and advertisers alike.
Sound research and good judgment lead me to recommend The Record for your media plans. Why not contact Chuck Hayes, their National Ad Manager, at 201-646-4257. With The Record on our schedule, we'll be drawing sales curves toward the sky!

tinel's $700,000 account. "If you need to know what's happening locally, in Broward County and West Palm [Beach], then we are the best source of news."

The News and Sun-Sentinel rely on print and radio, with a smattering of tv spots. Toward the end of the week, the combined Saturday and Sunday paper, News & Sun-Sentinel, uses radio.

The 2-year-old campaign forced changes in the Herald's advertising from a light humorous approach to one pushing local news, Mr. Harris says.

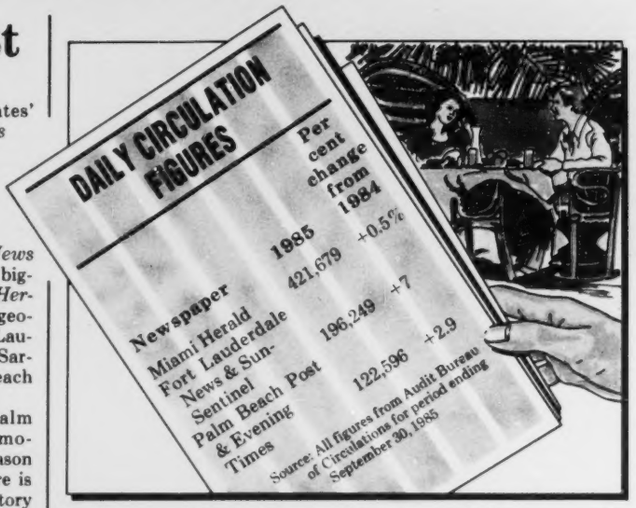
The Herald's Mr. Barger disagrees. "I haven't seen any change in our approach, and I don't recall any instance when we tailored our ads because of something they [News and Sun-Sentinel] did," he says. "We've always felt the first chore of being on tv is to get you noticed. Then deliver the message."

Steve Walker & Associates' Mr. Harris says the Herald's ads are fun, but questions their effectiveness. "We take the point of view, 'Let them be fun. We'll be important,' " he says.

"The Fort Lauderdale News and Sun-Sentinel is a much bigger threat than the Miami Herald simply because of the geographical location of Fort Lauderdale," says J. Lawrence Sartory, president of Palm Beach Newspapers.

The affluence of the Palm Beach area raises the demographics, but the primary reason for the newspaper wars there is the market growth, Mr. Sartory says. "Any survey you pick up shows it is anywhere from the first to the fourth fastest growing market in the country."

In March, the Palm Beach Post and Evening News introduced a campaign designed to differentiate between the locals and the invaders, with the tag line, "Your newspaper should be important, not imported."



"It's aimed at anybody coming into this market—USA Today, the News and Sun-Sentinel or the Herald," Mr. Sartory says.

In 1983, the jointly owned but separately run Post and Times began merging staffs. As of Jan. 6, only the editorial and op-ed pages are prepared independently, giving the papers combined circulation strength.

The "Imported" campaign, which promotes both papers, will run until March, when a new campaign is scheduled to break, Mr. Sartory says.

"We're working on a campaign that will have a different focus for 1986," says Denise Jones, account exec at Miami-based Caravetta, Allen, Kimbrough-BBDO, the papers' agency.

Although Mr. Sartory considers the News and Sun-Sentinel primary competition, the Herald has made an effort to strengthen its readership in the Palm Beach area.

In 1984, the Herald tripled its staff to beef up local coverage. Also, in Palm Beach, the Sunday Herald sells for 50 cents, while everywhere else it costs 75 cents.

However, the Herald's activity in the Palm Beach market has not affected the Post's circulation, Mr. Sartory says.

Regardless of the gains and the losses, one thing is certain: The big guns will still blast.

"I can't speak for what the boardroom of the Herald will do, but we are now and will continue to be the dominant newspaper in Broward and south Palm Beach County," says the News and Sun-Sentinel's Mr. Plaisted. "If we continue to go the way we're going, some of those folks who are now competitors may see the light."

"None of us shows any signs of going broke," Mr. Barger says. "The Tribune Co. has the Cubs and the New York Daily News. They seem to be solvent and they seem to be in it for the long run," he says. "I don't think there'll be anybody waving the white flag."

teur golf, bowling and tennis tournaments as well as the Dallas Morning News Basketball Classic.

In addition to daily feeds on various radio stations in the area, the News sponsors a daily program on public radio station KERA (fm). "It's an upscale audience, so it's the right group of people," Mr. Halbreich says. "It also gives us the ability to focus on breaking stories in the morning's paper and provides a forum for promoting what's important to our news department."

The Times Herald community commitments accelerated when Times Mirror came in, according to Ms. Walton. Perhaps the best known sports event the newspaper sponsors is the Dallas Times Herald Invitational Track Meet, which began in 1981.

"The city is pleased, I think, to have a first-class kind of event such as this because of the recognition it brings Dallas," Ms. Walton says.

"Both newspapers have changed typographically," Mr. Thorp says. "They've added new sections in the last year and there's been some grabbing of columnists and writers from one newspaper to the other, which is an attention grabber."

Over-all, in 1985, both papers made more of a product improvement effort than seen in other cities, because of the fierce competition between the two, he says.

Coloring comics to change with the times

By Julie Liesse Erickson

Grab a sandwich with Dagwood. Commiserate with Charlie Brown. Catch up on the latest with Brenda Starr.

For many Americans, these are cherished traditions, as regular a part of Sunday as football games and as routine as the Monday morning commute.

For newspapers, too, it's been a rule of thumb that the comics sell papers. Pick the strips you want, have the printer make up the section and, voila, instant readership.

However, taking the comics for granted is not such a good idea, nor is this attitude enough to keep the section viable, according to leading syndicators, cartoonists and newspaper executives.

Comic strips have changed. They are more relevant, topical, trend-oriented and targeted to specific demographics, syndicate and newspaper executives say. There are fewer continuity strips and more varieties of humor. Most strip art is less detailed, perhaps more hurried than in the past, many industry executives say.

"[Our project] was based on a sense on the part of a lot of us involved with comics that the Sunday section had lost a lot of its punch over the decades," says Bill Baker, vp-news for Knight-Ridder Newspapers, Miami. "We felt that the comics were losing some of their intensity with readers."

In February, 1982, Mr. Baker headed the creative committee for the 21st Century Comics project, an ad hoc organization representing syndicates, newspapers, cartoonists, ad agencies and sales reps. Metro Sunday Network, New York, initiated the project.

"The project's original goal was to take a look at newspaper comics and what they were doing right—and wrong," says Thomas Craddock, sales director-comics at MSN, which sells space in the Sunday magazines and comic sections of 100 U.S. newspapers.

Research sponsored by the 21st Century committees and conducted by Scarborough Research, New York, revealed what comic sections still are doing right: Attracting readers.

Scarborough's 1983 study reported that of Americans receiving a Sunday newspaper, 53% of adults and 79% of readers 17 and younger read the comic section. Loyalty also is a characteristic, with 80% saying they read all four comic sections during a four-week period.

But in some cases, the comics fall a frame short. "There were eight to ten key things we found, essentially all based around the idea that the Sunday comic section is unedited, archaic and not very modern, at every level," Mr. Baker says.

Using the same size panels is a key problem. "Comic books long ago broke out of the panel approach, making the Sunday comics look old and tired," he says. "Newspaper comic sections also lack a package approach. It's been strips, strips, strips for as long as anyone can remember.

"We found also that the comics completely neglected two key areas of young people's interest, music and sports."

Making sure the comics maintain their traditional appeal for children and teens has been a primary concern. "Too many papers were skewing away from kids and toward adults," Mr. Craddock says. "One of the most important parts of the comic section's role is to get kids involved with the paper."

Today's young reader is tomorrow's subscriber and, according to the study, 10 to 17-year-olds call the comics the most important part of the newspaper.

The 21st Century research committee suggests that newspapers incorporate more reader-participation features, such as contests, trivia games and clubs and more pop culture news and strips with broad, family appeal. Editors also must pay more attention to comic section design as a whole. "Kids today are surrounded by so much graphic sophistication, you just can't throw garbage at them anymore," Mr. Craddock says.

During the '60s and '70s, when most of the newspaper was redesigned, the Sunday comic section remained virtually unchanged, Mr. Baker says. Perhaps this is because the section is an anomaly for most newspapers. It's printed out of house, sometimes out of state; it's printed in color; generally all the material is supplied by non-staffers, and it has little advertising.

"The editors find it harder to get their hands on the material," says Mr. Baker, pointing out that over-all concern about the comics centers on the Sunday

"Here she comes, Miss What's-Her-Name."

Everybody knows Miss America, right? Wrong.

That's what the Institute of Outdoor Advertising discovered recently when we asked people to name the winner of the 1985 Miss America beauty pageant.

In our selected test markets, less than 2%—virtually nobody—knew that Miss Sharlene Wells is also known as Miss America 1985.

By itself, it may not be too astonishing. Until you consider that the question was asked after four months of media hype, primetime TV specials, and a string of talk show appearances.

Putting a price tag on that kind of exposure is next to impossible. But whether it was $1-million or $10-million, the fact remains—after four months of broadcast and print media exposure, Sharlene Wells was still a highly-publicized unknown.

The big change came after she spent a month with us. The Outdoor Channel.

After just 30 days of Outdoor Advertising, Miss America's recognition factor jumped almost 700%. Unaided.

If you want that kind of impact for your product or service, you need the Outdoor Channel. Simple. Direct. Uncluttered. And positioned enviably in the middle of the world's most mobile and affluent society.

Changing with the times section. "The bottom line is that the editors have control over [the weekday comic pages], unlike the Sunday comics. If you do nothing but send a list of strips to your printer, how involved do you get?"

Tom Feran, who as features editor supervises the comics for the Cleveland Plain Dealer, a Newhouse Newspapers property, says he'd like to improve the design of the comics because it's one of only three sections in the Sunday paper that regularly feature color. "We'd like to make better use of that opportunity."

But, he says, "It's harder to do something with it, because you're doing it by remote control."

The 21st Century creative committee report, released in February, 1985, suggests specific design changes, including varying sizes of strips and individual panels, filling white space with smaller features such as jokes and packaging popular features as a unit.

"Reaction to these suggestions has been 'It looks good, looks great—now, how do I do it?'" Mr. Craddock says. But perhaps more significantly, the question is who will do it.

Syndicates say the responsibility should rest with newspapers.

"They are wonderful suggestions, but the real stumbling block now is how to execute these ideas," says Bob Ferguson, managing editor for Tribune Media Services, Orlando, Fla., distributor of "Shoe" and 19 other daily strips. "They should have done a feasibility study as an adjunct to the 21st Century project. I mean, how can you ask Jeff MacNelly, who draws 'Shoe' for 1,000 papers, to redraw that strip for 15 newspapers?"

The bottom line is that it's easier for everyone involved to maintain the straight-strip status quo. In addition, not everyone agrees that newspaper comic sections need a design update in the first place.

"Essentially I think that if the newspaper devotes a fair amount of space to a strip and displays it properly, the talent will sell itself," says Al Leeds, sales manager for the Washington Post Writers Group, syndicator of three strips, including "Bloom County."

But debate rages on about what constitutes a fair amount of space. "One of the biggest concerns of creators is that the medium be preserved, and a key problem is the reduction in size made by newspapers," says Bill Yates, comics editor for Hearst Corp.'s King Features Syndicate, New York, distributor of 50 strips, including "Blondie," "Hagar the Horrible" and "Beetle Bailey."

"Study after study shows that the comics are the best-read, most popular, most emotionally charged part of the newspaper; it's stupid to kill your No. 1 feature. They say they're doing it to save space, but that's not valid," Mr. Yates says.

"When the redebut of 'Doonesbury,' we had an opportunity to fight back a little," says Lee Salem, managing editor for Universal Press Syndicate, which also distributes "Cathy." When "Doonesbury" creator Garry Trudeau returned from a 21-month hiatus Sept. 30, 1984, the syndicate demanded his strip run in a space wider and deeper than the normal slot. Despite much discussion, the effort seems to have had little impact on the strip's popularity, Mr. Salem says.

"Why take something that helps newspapers keep old readers and attract new ones and shrink it down so that you can't even read it with your glasses on?"

Comics such as "Boomer's Song," "Calvin & Hobbes" and "Doonesbury" are part of a trend toward comics targeting specific demographics.

In addition to display size, syndicates and artists complain about newspapers' impatience with new strips. "Every once in a while you hit a real winner that catches on quickly, but it generally takes a long time to build an audience," Mr. Yates says. "And today, there's not as much patience on the part of editors to give a strip time to get a foothold.

"I'm convinced that if these conditions existed back in the 1960s, 'Peanuts' wouldn't exist today. It and 'Beetle Bailey' were both slow starters. I just think it's wrong to not give a strip a chance; and it's worse to buy a strip and not run it."

But, syndicate executives admit, to a large degree they have created the problem.

"We're all out there fighting for a finite amount of space, with five or six syndicates each sending out two or three new offerings each year," Mr. Salem says.

On top of that, says the Plain Dealer's Mr. Feran, "A comic strip isn't just a strip standing alone any more. The licensing surrounding comic strip characters makes that newspaper space more valuable."

However, some industry executives hesitate to call the comics an essential selling point for a newspaper. The New York Times, which has thrived despite the lack of a comics page, is often referred to as an example. Others say the trend toward colorful, flashy newspaper design may make comic sections expendable. "If USA Today is the newspaper of the future, where does that leave the comics?" Mr. Ferguson asks.

"One problem we've found after concluding our project is that the Sunday comics are such a behemothic, interlocked area of the paper that it's going to be hard to get the changes going," Mr. Baker says. He hopes two or three Knight-Ridder papers will lead the way with substantial changes during 1986.

Others hope change will come soon. "I'm not sure newspapers realize how important the comics are to them," Universal's Mr. Salem says. "To continue to disregard them as witnessed with the shrinkage in strip size would be a mistake."

INFLUENCE:

Toledo's newspaper has had a strong community influence for 150 years.

The Blade is more than a newspaper. It is a community institution . . . investing itself in the economic, cultural and political life . . . working to set priorities . . . sparking ideas . . . using its influence to help great things happen.

There is a rebirth today in downtown Toledo. One major project is SeaGate, a riverfront development dominated by the new 32-story world headquarters of Owens-Illinois, pictured at left.

Another is the exciting Portside Festival Marketplace. It features 76 shops and restaurants with food, merchandise and entertainment, all in a festival atmosphere.

Great things are happening in Toledo, with hardly a block left untouched in a massive revitalization of the riverfront and downtown.

The Blade's strong influence makes it a good catalyst for community achievement. It's an influence we share with advertisers in our 14-county market. Sunday coverage, 82%; daily coverage 67%.

Ad sales no laughing matter

Like other advertising media, newspaper comics were derailed by tv's arrival in the 1950s. Those who sell space in comic sections still are trying to get business back on track.

"Back in the 1940s and 1950s, newspaper comics were the only newspaper ad medium available in four-color," says Thomas Craddock, comic sales director for Metro Sunday Newspapers, New York. Automobile and cigaret companies were heavy users. Many advertisers even devised cartoon characters of their own, featured in continuity strips.

"As a matter of fact, when MSN was founded, 75% of our total ad income came from the comics, only 25% from Sunday magazines," Mr. Craddock says. "Today, that's reversed."

Of U.S. newspapers' $25.5 billion in 1985 ad revenues, only about $15 million to $20 million comes from comic sections, Mr. Craddock says. "We could double that easily with the efforts we're putting into it. It's just a matter of education and economy," he says. "Comic sections are an untapped resource."

Advertising has been limited by marketers who don't think their products fit into the comics, some executives say. Others say new tones and styles of comic strips have been responsible for the lack of advertising. "Your success with comic section advertising has a lot to do with the kinds of comics you're running; lighthearted, family-oriented comics are the ones we look for," says Rod Moake, assistant ad director for the San Antonio Express-News.

But if they don't feature many ads, comic sections increasingly are being used as wrappers for free-standing inserts.

Two dailies, Newhouse Newspapers' Cleveland Plain Dealer and News America Publishing's Express-News, print stand-alone color comic sections on Wednesdays to hold a burgeoning number of inserts.

For the Express-News, this has provided two bonuses: Extra advertising and potentially higher readership. "We've learned that the comics have a great deal of loyalty attached to them. If we could ride on that, we realized it might facilitate greater readership during the week," Mr. Moake says.

Since the Express-News started Wednesday Comics Plus in September, 1984, the section has exceeded advertising projections, Mr. Moake says. The typical six pages of comics has been expanded to as much as 16 or 18 with ads and inserts.

Not only do the comics wrap ads, they often are wrapped themselves. Those half-page vertical ads that fold around comic sections, called spadeas, have grown in popularity.

But, while spadeas offer high visibility for an advertiser, they present two editorial problems, Mr. Craddock says. "First, it's seen as an intrusion by many readers. On top of that, if I were a newspaper editor, I wouldn't want my masthead blotted out by an ad. It's a fad."

However, the over-all future of comic sections' advertising is optimistic, Mr. Craddock says. "We've received a tremendous response from advertisers looking for an alternative to kid tv, which is completely saturated, where their ad gets lost in the whirl of clutter," he says.

The San Antonio Express News is one paper tapping the comics.

"Advertisers should use this medium," says Bill Yates, comics editor for King Features Syndicate, New York. "What a natural place to advertise, what a smart way to tie into a character's popularity."

Although no one is panicking, if advertising does not materialize, the comics, expensive to acquire and to print, could be in trouble, some executives say.

"The problem has been that with less advertising in the comics, as advertisers look at all the other options in and out of the newspaper, it takes away the comics' cost justification," says Bill Baker, vp-news for Knight-Ridder Newspapers, Miami. "Newspapers have become more businesslike, and in the effort to keep the bottom line intact, comics are somewhat vulnerable."

But, he says, "With their demographics and readership high, I see no reason why the comics can't be seen as a viable, effective ad medium." —J.L.E.

TV AVAILS

This is a special National Assn. of Television Program Executives edition of Tv Avails, listing barter syndicated shows that are expected to be among the hottest newcomers to national tv this fall. Since most syndicators are still clearing stations for the programs at the NATPE convention in New Orleans this week, national ad rates have not been set in most cases.

"SilverHawks" is the next first-run, $15 million animated half-hour afternoon strip from Lorimar-Telepictures, which has already cleared the 65-episode series in more than 65 markets for a fall start. There are 2½ national minutes for sale.

"Banko," a Bingo-inspired game show strip, is off to a "brisk" clearance start via 20th Century Fox TV, whose executives are withholding specifics until after NATPE sales. Fox is selling one national minute in each of the 260 half hours.

"The Oprah Winfrey Show," a first-run, one-hour talk show strip hosted by the WLS-TV, Chicago, personality now starring in the movie "The Color Purple." "Oprah" has been cleared for fall in at least 90 markets on a cash-plus-barter basis by King World. It's geared primarily for daytime.

"The Ted Knight Show" is a weekly, fall, half-hour, cash-plus-barter sitcom designed by D.L. Taffner/Ltd. as sort of a sequel to "Too Close for Comfort," now a Monday-through-Friday strip. First fall commitment is from the Metromedia station group. LBS Communications is handling sales of the 1½ commercial minutes in each of the planned 22 episodes. It's expected to appeal to most of the scores of outlets already clearing "Comfort."

"Kideo TV" is a first-run weekly package of three DIC Enterprises-animated series being bartered for spring startup by LBS Communications. The package can air as a 90-minute bloc or as three separate half hours, "Rainbow Brite," "The Popples" and "Ulysses 31." LBS is selling six ad minutes to national sponsors, except in the fourth quarter when LBS will sell three minutes.

"MTV Top 20 Video Countdown" is due for April startup from Viacom Enterprises, as a weekly one-hour series. Going into barter syndication after running earlier each week on cable's MTV: Music Television, the show will contain six national and six local commercial minutes.

"Smurfs," due this September as a half-hour, offnetwork strip cartoon, is being geared mainly for independent stations by Television Program Enterprises, and primarily for their morning and after-school dayparts. Two national minutes will be sold by TPE in each of the 125 episodes. "Smurfs" has been a consistent Nielsen ratings blockbuster for NBC-TV since 1981 in the Saturday morning daypart.

"Falcon Crest," the first major offnet prime time series hit to go into barter rather than cash syndication, will have ex-CBS 128 episodes ready for fall, with Lorimar-Telepictures selling six national ad minutes, and the remaining six available for local station sales. More than a dozen major markets already have been cleared.

"Disney Magic I" is the 25-title movie package from Disney Television, consisting of 20 offnetwork theatricals, four offnet made-for-tv movies and one ex-Disney Channel cable title. Ten of the 22 ad minutes will be available for national sponsorhip during the first two years of the 4½-year contract span. Titles include "Absent-Minded Professor" and "TRON" in 1986, "The Black Hole" and "The Love Bug" in 1987, "Escape to Witch Mountain" in '88, "Freaky Friday" in '89, "Splash" in 1990, "Mary Poppins" and "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea" during 1991.

"Friday Night Ringside" will air as a monthly series of fights from Anheuser-Busch Productions, from Jan. 24 through Dec. 26. There will be six national minutes available in the package, with Anheuser-Busch retaining the malt-liquor exclusive.

In non-NATPE news, the following are cable tv avails:

"CBN News Tonight," new nightly news program, CBN, anchored by Robert Hughes and broadcast live from Washington at 10 p.m. Monday through Friday beginning Jan. 27. A 1.5 rating expected, $1,200 per 30-second spot. Scattered avails; signed advertisers, not disclosed, were said to be computer and telephone companies.

"The Campbells," CBN, new series about Scottish pioneers emigrating to Canada, airs 7 p.m. Saturdays and carries a 3 rating. Scattered avails at $2,000 per 30-second spot.

ON THE DIAL

On the Dial lists scheduled radio specials and new programs or syndicated services.

"Country Closeup," a one-hour weekly special combining music and interviews, will feature singer-songwriter John Denver the weekend of Feb. 24. Cleared on approximately 175 stations. No word on advertisers. Syndicated by Narwood Productions, New York.

"American Music Awards Nomination Special," a four-hour special by United Stations Programming Network, New York, features capsule interviews and music from nominated artists such as Madonna, Tina Turner and Bruce Springsteen. Hosted by Dick Clark, it airs the weekend of Jan. 25 and 26. Sponsored by ABC-TV, which will telecast the awards live Jan. 27.

"Evergreen," a new adult contemporary format now being introduced by Drake-Chenault, Canoga Park, Cal. Designed for the 35-to-44-year-old nonrock listener, the beautiful music-type format features performers such as Billy Joel, the Carpenters and Anne Murray.

TV POWER SHARES

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decidedly a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

Some of the earliest midseason "fixes" seemed not to be strengthening weak spots appreciably during this week, in part because several series already are so well entrenched. Misfits of Science, for instance, tied CBS' slipping Twilight Zone, but lagged well behind Webster and Mr. Belvedere. Those sitcoms got off to a slow start last fall, initially hurt by Zone. NBC's other Friday change, Knight Rider, returning to its old Friday parking space, seems likely to consolidate NBC's hold on the No. 2 position behind Dallas. The final Friday hour continues to find Miami Vice's MTV cops dominating former time-slot leader Falcon Crest. Both, appealing to very different target audiences, together left ABC's relocated Fall Guy to muster the leftovers, a 12 share. Saturday, once solidly in ABC's win column, now seems headed NBC's way, a la Tuesday, as Golden Girls, 227 and Hunter benefit from ABC's sinking Love Boat and CBS' films—especially lackluster on a night now heavily given over to at-home vcr and pay cable movie watching. Sunday went to CBS in a big way, as 60 Minutes (down somewhat due to an NFL playoff runover on NBC), Murder, She Wrote and the new CBS Sunday Night Movie ("Rockabye") overwhelmed runners-up by 15 to 16 share points. That movie debut, however, may be misleading since the counter-programing consisted of two reruns, ABC's Diamonds Are Forever and part one of NBC's Fatal Vision. Scarecrow & Mrs. King again held sway over its rivals, widening the gap over TV's Bloopers & Practical Jokes, its opposition last season.

HIGHLIGHTS

Thompson returns to barter 1

J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, is barter syndicating tv shows for the first time since 1982 when the Marie Luisi scandal forced it out of that business. The agency's return involves the syndication of a barter tv sports special, "Kemper Sports/1986 North American Pro Kick-Off," for Kemper Group, the Long Grove, Ill.-based insurer handled out of JWT's Chicago office.

Nestle to stir up powdered drinks 2

Nestle Enterprises will enter the $796 million powdered drink-mix category with a new sugar-free tea and fruit juice mix in a bid to wrest market share from General Foods and Borden's Wyler's brand. Nestea Ice Teasers will be introduced nationally in April, backed by an $8 million introductory campaign from J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. The Ice Teasers line, which will be sweetened with NutraSweet, will include citrus, lemon, orange and tropical flavors and will be competitively priced with GF's Crystal Light.

Cola giants trading punches 3

Coca-Cola USA and Pepsi-Cola USA are moving to the $6 billion citrus segment, as both companies step up new-product activity. Both are rolling national with orange-flavor, juice-content soft drinks—Minute Maid orange soda from Coca-Cola and mandarin-orange Slice from Pepsi. Additionally, Coca-Cola is adding a lemon/lime flavor to its Minute Maid entry. Also, Pepsi as expected announced that it will purchase loss-plagued Seven-Up Co. from Philip Morris Cos. (see related story on Page 1).

DDB sets up international board 3

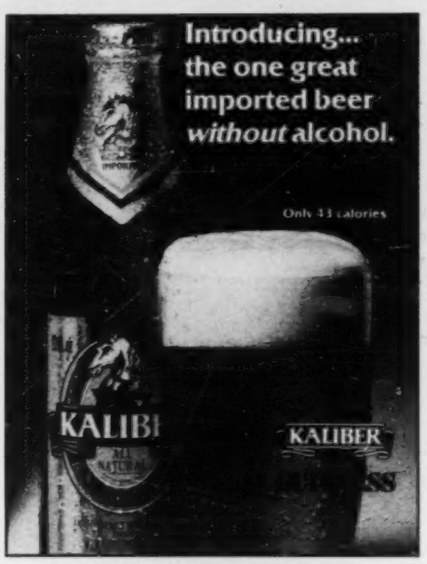
Doyle Dane Bernbach has created separate U.S. and international boards for the first time and has named exec vp Lloyd Highbloom to the newly created post of director of multinational account planning. The moves complete a multistage reorganization that represents Barry Loughrane's first major sustained attempt to rouse DDB from its sluggishness since he became chairman-ceo of the parent Doyle Dane Bernbach Group in mid-'84.

Stumbling shops find each other 3

Hal Bay's resignation as president of D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles this month is only the latest in a string of events that has haunted D'Arcy MacManus Masius and B&B for more than a year. The second installment of a series provides an insider's view of two agencies on a losing streak and how they found each other in the largest agency merger in history.

Nike pushes women's wear 6

Nike is bounding into women's apparel with an extensive line of sports and leisure wear as it continues to exploit niches that stretch beyond its running-shoe roots. The Beaverton, Ore.-based company's expansion into women's wear is inspired by the growing numbers of women exercising and playing sports. The upscale product line includes tennis dresses and tops, muscle tights, unitards, jacket-pants combos and running shorts, as well as leisure wear.



BATF rules on 'alcohol-free' ads 35

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms in Washington has ruled if a beverage contains less than 0.5% alcohol, then it isn't beer. That ruling, which also bans the term "alcohol-free" on nonalcoholic beer brands, is forcing label changes and at least one company's ad plans.

In-script tv ads in Brazil 58

It is common practice in Brazil for brand name products to pop up within a tv show's story line, but Brazil's largest undergarment marketer Valerin Industrias Textil has become the talk of Sao Paulo because an outdoor board advertising its Hope panties has become part of the story line in a popular prime time soap opera.

Are midsize agencies doomed? 58

U.S. multinational ad agencies are gobbling up medium-size shops at such a fast pace around the world that industry experts question whether such agencies are headed for extinction.

NBC wants Olympic insurance 60

NBC's request for a $100 million "insurance" bond from South Korea has delayed the contract signing for tv rights to the 1988 Summer Olympics. South Korean organizers were balking at the idea they should put up bond to protect NBC if ad revenues fail to meet expectations.

OTHER NEWS

Three years ago, only a handful of advertisers and agencies sent a contingent to the National Assn. of Television Program Executives convention. This year, some estimated as many as 1,000 advertiser participants attended. Page 12.

The liquor industry was down nearly 2% in 1985, which was certainly a little bit better than anticipated. Much of this good showing, however, related to the retail inventory buildup in late summer in anticipation of the $2 per gallon increase in the excess tax effective Oct. 1. Page 35.

The word heard most often at this month's National Retail Merchants Assn. convention in New York was "change"—the changing consumer marketplace and the changing ways retailers must deal with it in order to succeed. Page 38.

The flatness and light weight of new liquid-crystal-display technology, proponents say, will give rise to compact hang-on-the-wall sets that consumers would substitute for traditional cathode-ray-tube models. LCD technology, now in its infancy, is expected to fuel a doubling of the market for hand-held tvs this year, to about 1.5 million units. Page 43.

Paul Kalmanovitz, the reclusive beer baron who bought Milwaukee-based Pabst last year and immediately fired both its national agencies, has taken out page ads in Milwaukee dailies defending himself and his disdain for advertising. The ad also announces plans for "dismantling the closed Pabst Brewery in Newark, N.J., for shipment to China" and plans for the U.S. launch of new products. Page 87.

CAMPAIGNS BREAKING

The Sporting News, St. Louis, this week breaks a $1.5 million tv campaign (AA, Dec. 16) featuring Chicago White Sox pitcher Tom Seaver to support the Times Mirror weekly's baseball coverage. Clark Direct Advertising, New York, is the agency.

Playboy, Chicago, on Jan. 31 breaks the first ads in a three-month spot tv test that promotes features in its March issue. Two 30-second ads are interrupted in the middle by an unrelated spot from another advertiser (AA, Jan. 13). Smith Burke & Azzam handles.

Vcrs may dethrone network tv

By JAMES P. FORKAN

New York—Videocassettes will overtake network tv to become the U.S.' No. 1 entertainment medium, and retail sales of prerecorded vcr titles will hit $20 billion by 1995, according to a new home video study by Wilkofsky Gruen Associates.

Those and other findings in the "Video 1995" report will be presented at a conference for investors by Merrill Lynch.

Vcrs are not "a fad," chairman David Wilkofsky said.

Instead, people are integrating them into their lives "exactly as an earlier generation did with broadcast tv programming."

Search for Herb weathers McD.L.T. blitz

By JULIE FRANZ

Burger King has found Herb just as consumers have begun to find—and remember—the campaign.

Network tv spots announcing the search for Herb, the hapless fellow who never has tried the chain's Whopper, broke Nov. 24, via J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. Unfortunately for BK, the chain began looking for Herb at the same time rival McDonald's was blitzing the airwaves with spots for its new McD.L.T. sandwich. As a result, McDonald's ad-awareness level in November increased 5.7 percentage points; BK's was down 4.4 points.

Results of the December survey show a major change, however. Last month, Burger King garnered 14.9% of first mentions, up 4.8 percentage points from November. That score strengthened its No. 2 position behind McDonald's, whose score skidded 8.1 percentage points to 40.9% despite having thrown everything, including The Refrigerator (William Perry), into its ad assault (via Leo Burnett USA, Chicago).

Those scores reverse the streak both chains had going: McDonald's 48.9% share of first mentions in November was its high-water mark for the year; Burger King's 10.1% share in November had been its low.

AdWatch is a joint project of Advertising Age and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. Ad awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample of consumers to name ads in a variety of product categories that first come to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

Rounding out the fast-food category at No. 3 is Wendy's with 12.4% of first mentions, up 2.9 percentage points from November. On Nov. 25, Wendy's broke a new spot directed by Joe Sedelmaier spoofing a Soviet fashion show where the same outfit is accessorized for different occasions (AA, Nov. 18). This is the first spot in the "Choose fresh. Choose Wendy's" campaign, via Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York, that has caused any significant increase in Wendy's ad-awareness score.

Fast-food outlets also dominated adWatch's top 10 in over-all, unaided awareness (without asking for a specific product category). In December the best-recalled advertising was, in descending order, McDonald's, Wendy's, Burger King, Coca-Cola, Miller/Miller Lite, Budweiser/Bud Light, Pepsi, Ford, Bartles & Jaymes (Gallo) and

Influence Orange County pacesetters
Orange County, California. More than a market of over 2 million people, it's a county in motion. Where an upwardly mobile, on-the-go lifestyle is the norm rather than the exception.
Whether traveling by helicopter or by freeway, Orange Countians have given new meaning to the term "progress," earning a median household income that ranks among the nation's top ten metro markets.
And their affluent, fast-paced lifestyle has created a huge demand for products and services of all kinds.
The Orange County Register MetroGroup is the most effective way to influence Orange County pacesetters. Its 810,000 daily circulation leads its closest competitor by almost 125,000 subscription copies in Orange County.
It is particularly effective to reach the county's pacesetters — in just five issues you not only reach over 1 million adult readers, you reach 90% of the county's chief wage earners.
So to influence a group of people whose purchases like the pace of things that keep pace with Orange County's own, turn to the leader. The Orange County Register MetroGroup.

Nike pushes upscale women's wear

By BRIAN LOWRY

Nike is bounding into women's apparel with an extensive line of sports and leisure wear as it continues to exploit markets that stretch beyond its running-shoe roots.

The Beaverton, Ore.-based company's expansion into women's wear is inspired by the growing numbers of women exercising and playing sports. The upscale product line includes tennis dresses and tops, muscle tights, unitards, jacket-pants combos and running shorts, as well as leisure wear such as oversize fleece t-shirts.

Prices range from $14 for shorts to $190 for a tennis warmup jacket. All the clothing carries the Nike label, though only the t-shirts will bear the familiar Swoosh logo.

Nike is taking on both mainstream women's apparel marketers and sporting attire marketers. International Playtex's Danskin division, New York, is the category leader, challenged by Capezio Shoes, a division of athletic marketing giant United States Shoes Corp., Cincinnati. Grey Advertising handles Danskin. U.S. Shoes recently moved its advertising in-house, breaking with Leber Katz Partners, New York.

The Tennis Wear & Fitness Wear products continue Nike's diversification, undertaken after a shift in consumer preference led to excess inventory and two losing quarters in 1984.

Nike has rebounded to show gradually improving profits during the last two quarters and appears to be building momentum.

Nike achieved the turnaround in part by fine-tuning its products, slashing ad budgets and introducing specialty lines supported through corresponding magazines.

In the past, that meant targeting a specific sport; here it means a sizable schedule in women's magazines, including February-through-April appearances in Elle, Glamour and Vogue. Ads also will run in spring issues of tennis publications.

Characteristically devoid of copy, the ads "try to romanticize sports" to women, said Mike Wilskey, Nike's assistant ad manager. Chiat/Day, Los Angeles, handles.

The agency's creative team included Lee Clow, exec vp-creative director; Rick Boyko, art director; Bill Hamilton, copywriter, and Dave Luhr, account supervisor.

The emphasis on women's apparel will greatly reduce Nike's advertising for McEnroe, the John McEnroe-endorsed line of men's tennis shoes and attire, Mr. Wilskey said. McEnroe had domestic sales of $3.5 million in the last fiscal year, getting heavy outdoor ad support last spring from C/D.

Nike Inc. is trying to romanticize sports to women in a series of magazine ads by Chiat/Day, Los Angeles, for its Fitness Wear line.

Another specialty line recently suffered a major setback. Due to a cool reception by the trade, Nike canceled shoes from Stickball, a new line of baseball clothes and accessories featuring New York Mets pitcher Dwight Gooden and Atlanta Braves outfielder Dale Murphy (AA, Sept. 23).

Nike hoped the baseball-style shoes would catch on as casual wear and promised a major ad push but apparently struck out with sporting goods buyers.

Although Stickball apparel will still make an April debut, advertising has been put on hold, as has a decision as to which Nike agency—C/D or Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore.—will handle it.

BMW

Maker's Mark is not the kind of product one buys for the purpose of impressing others.

There's so little of it around, you'd never know whether the person you wanted to impress had heard of it or not.

And to make matters worse, bourbon isn't exactly enjoying a run of popularity right now.

James Bacon, the Los Angeles Herald Examiner columnist and Hollywood's official "Scribe to the Stars," may have summed the situation up best.

"I'm not a bourbon drinker ordinarily," he wrote in his column, "but Maker's Mark is the best I've ever drunk by far. It is one of those rare bourbons that only connoisseurs know about."

So, you might say, buying a bottle of Maker's Mark is not unlike buying a BMW . . .

ten years ago.

After all, it's easy to buy something after it becomes popular.

What's really impressive is to have it before everyone else finds out about it.

Liquor sales drop, but not much

By JOHN C. MAXWELL JR.

The liquor industry was down nearly 2% in 1985, which was certainly a little bit better than anticipated. Much of this good showing, however, related to the retail inventory buildup in late summer in anticipation of the $2-per-gallon increase in the excess tax effective Oct. 1.

Retailers had been successful short-term in merchandising the tax increase as a savings to the consumer. Thus, the tax had a positive short-term effect by forcing inventory in.

The premium brands seem to be the least affected by the increase as the federal excise tax amounted to a 3%-to-5% increase on their base price. At the low end, however, the increase was more like 8% to 16%.

While we have no way of knowing whether Congress will hit the liquor industry with another "sin" tax in 1986 or beyond, further increases would accelerate the industry's decline. Whatever the 1985 drop turns out to be, we continue to believe the industry as a whole will be in a long-term decline phase, though certain niches will do extremely well.

For instance, the story of the year certainly is National Distiller's DeKuyper's Peachtree schnapps, which is estimated to sell 1.5 million cases in '85, making it the 24th-best-selling product in the U.S. It should be noted that it was introduced in October, 1984. We cannot remember a product that hit 1.5 million cases in one year. National Distiller's Original Apple Barrel, which was introduced in 1983, sold a little less than 400,000 cases in 1984 and about 450,000 cases are estimated for 1985.

Fruit-flavor schnapps seems to be the new drink trend. As such, new drinks with names like Fuzzy Navel (a combination of orange juice and Peachtree schnapps) have become the new "in" drinks. In addition, people drink it over ice or chill it or mix it with grapefruit juice. As a result of this success, the DeKuyper's brand is now No. 1 in the cordial line, and we would expect more products to follow.

National Distiller's now has more than 70% of the total schnapps market, with Peachtree alone having more than 50%. Other companies have followed suit, with Heublein introducing 12 new flavored schnapps in 1985, including peach, raspberry, blue grass and mint julep. Glenmore Distilleries' Mr. Boston unit and Hiram Walker also have entries.

The other new product in the industry is Jim Beam ZZZingers, a line of bourbon and soda in a can. This group of products is estimated to sell close to 600,000 cases in 1985. Again, this was barely in the market in 1984. Kobrand is in test markets with a Beefeater and Tonic in 200ml size. This is a premium product and the tonic is specially developed by James Burrough. This product currently is not available on the commercial market.

As far as future product trends, we may see some new products that would be categorized as "digestives" similar to those popular after-dinner drinks in Europe. One of these, Fernete Branca, will be imported by Carillon Importers beginning in 1986, and thus far advance orders look quite good. This would be another product in keeping with our trend towards health, fitness and generally feeling better. Yet another new product by Schiefflin, is the first entry in the sparkling liquor market. Called Petite Liqueur, it is a combination of old cognac and reserve wines under the Moet & Chandon label. It is in test in three markets.

It is interesting to note that the total nonwhisky area continues to move up slightly. Thus all the declines are in the whisky area, which has been the case for some time. In the former category, both rum, brandy, tequila and cocktails moved up, with the imported side of gin, rum and brandy showing the good gains. This was particularly evident with products such as Carillon's Absolut vodka, up 61.4%.

In the whisky area, Canadians were relatively flat, but Brown-Forman's Canadian Mist outperformed the category with the only meaningful gain. It continued its upward bent, rising 3.1% (in fourth position) and closing the gap between it and Seagram's 7 Crown. Scotch continued to decline the most in the whisky area.

Of the top 10 brands, the status of the first five remained unchanged, with Bacardi, the No. 1 brand of liquor in the U.S., up 0.5% compared with last year in unit sales. Second-place Heublein Smirnoff rose 0.2%, while No. 3 Seagram's 7 Crown fell 4.8%. American Brands' Jim Beam, No. 5 overall and the No. 1 bourbon, had one of the few over-all gains in the bourbon category, up 1.5%. Heublein's Popov vodka moved into sixth place from No. 9, replacing National Distiller's Windsor Supreme and fast closing in on the No. 5 spot. In fact, almost without exception, all of Heublein's brands showed improved performance, obviously outpacing the industry.#

BATF rules on 'alcohol-free' ad claims

By PAT WINTERS

It may smell like beer, look like beer and even taste like beer, but the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms in Washington has ruled if there's less than 0.5% alcohol, then it isn't beer.

That ruling, which also essentially bans the term "alcohol-free" on nonalcoholic beer brands, is forcing marketers to change their labels and has thrown a monkey wrench into at least one company's ad slogan.

The BATF ruling goes into effect on April 1 (AA, Sept. 16 et seq.).

Kaliber, a nonalcoholic beer from Ireland imported by Guinness Import Co., Stamford, Conn., successfully has been using the radio and print ad slogan "All the taste of an imported beer—but no alcohol." That slogan now may have to be changed to "All the taste of an imported malt beverage, but nonalcoholic," which the company admits is less than catchy. The company intends to ask BATF to allow use of the term "taste of an imported beer."

"Because it does have the taste of an imported beer," explained a company spokesman, "we're maintaining that we are not calling it [Kaliber] a beer." The Marketing Center, Westport, Conn., is the Kaliber agency.

The BATF ruling is just more bad news in the nonalcoholic beer segment, which, after a year in which thousands of dollars were spent publicizing the dangers of drinking and driving, still is struggling to become known as a viable beverage alternative.

Industry experts estimate the nonalcoholic beer segment totals from 5 million to 8 million cases, compared with the total beer market, which numbers about 2.5 billion cases.

In an effort to inform consumers, the BATF ruling says alcohol-free beverages must contain no alcohol, and beverages with less than 0.5%, which constitute virtually all of the alcohol-free beer brands, must not be labeled as such and can be called only "nonalcoholic." Marketers charge that many products contain traces of alcohol, including white bread, orange juice and lemon-lime soda. Meanwhile, the BATF definition of beer is that it contain more than 0.5% alcohol. Anything less is called a "malt beverage."

"The cost of changing the labels and advertising is insignificant," said one industry source. "What's significant is that we're losing potential sales because I can't say beer. A consumer doesn't want a light-malt beverage, he wants a beer."

But the miniscule market and the latest BATF rule hasn't dampened the interest of beer marketers who are continuing to jump into the no-alcohol fray. Some two dozen no-alcohol brands are said to be on the market, and more are on the way.

Brewers and importers say they are attracted to the no-alcohol beer category because of its current prestige, and its estimated annual growth rate of 25%. They also believe no-alcohol beers, often priced as high as imported beers, are stalking the right trend in a health-concious America. The nonalcoholic and low-calorie beers generally target the active, 25-to-50-year-old age group which might drink the product after a tennis match or during cocktail hour.

"We are looking [in an] educated crystal ball," explained John Bissell, senior vp-special products division, Stroh Brewery, Detroit, which will roll out Barbican, a British import and the brewer's first no-alcohol brand, in March. "The category fits the times and the product tastes good. We should be able to make sales."

Leading the category is Kingsbury, marketed by G. Heileman Brewing Co., LaCrosse, Wis., and Whitestone, N.Y.-based White Rock Products Corp.'s Moussy. Moussy is petitioning BATF on yet another "Catch 22" situation. Mark Cooper, Moussy's marketing director, says his brand has just 0.3% alcohol, but the ruling allows labels only to say "less than 0.5% alcohol."

"Since we have less alcohol than other products in the field, then we should be allowed to say how much we have," said Mr. Cooper. "They're lumping it together as one blanket category, which is not rational or in the interest of the consumer."

Industry insiders attribute the current lack of awareness for nonalcoholic beers to limited advertising. According to the 1984 Leading National Advertisers, Moussy, which basically created awareness of the category, spent $411,000 while Wartek, imported by Omni Industries, Greenwich, Conn., spent $115,000.

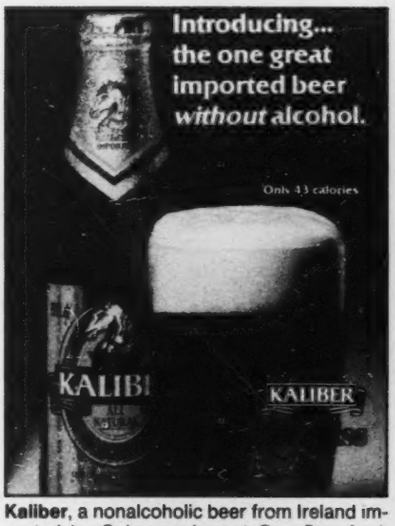
But no-alcohol beer marketers are optimistic that, as larger brewers jump into the market with big ad budgets, the entire category will expand. Stroh expects to roll out Barbican in March, and will support it with national print ads and tv in selected markets via MCA Advertising, New York. Competitors estimate Stroh's introductory ad budget will total about $1.5 million.

Moussy will spend $3 million in 1986 on tv and radio spots in selected markets. Moussy's $3 million ad campaign, which carries the theme of "The drink to choose when you choose not to drink," recently moved to Geer, DuBois, New York, from Venet Advertising. Warteck, which is now in 30 states and will roll out in Chicago and Los Angeles in the spring, will continue radio, print and 10-second tv spots in selected markets via Grey Advertising, New York.

Other imports now rolling out on the market include Poppen and Clausthaler, both from Germany, and Kaliber. Poppen, imported by Poppen Imports, Point Pleasant Beach, N.J., is in limited distribution in the Northeast.

Radio spots, handled in-house, are expected to break in New York before spring.

Clausthaler, imported by All Brand Importers, New York, now is rolling out nationally and intends to launch an ad campaign, via McCann-Erickson, New York, in the spring.#



Kaliber, a nonalcoholic beer from Ireland imported by Guinness Import Co., Stamford, Conn., has been using the radio and print ad slogan "All the taste of an imported beer—but no alcohol." That slogan now may have to be changed. The Marketing Center, Westport, Conn., handles.

None of the usual flashy pictures of bodies in bathing suits here. Instead, clever use of typography allows the headline to say it all in this ad for Broward County Tourist Development Council, via BDA/BBDO, Atlanta. We chose this ad partly because we like Hercules, but also because it's an effective use of localized newspaper advertising to generate excitement over a product. The ad, via VanSant Dugdale Advertising, Baltimore, was run in newspapers near military bases that support the 132nd Aviation Company. Creative directors: Stan Paulau, Drew Babb; art director: Anne Prochazka; copywriter: Bruce Jacobs; illustrator: Robert Dale.

If you like Bugs Bunny (and we do), you've gotta love this ad for Sony Corp. of America's SuperBeta Hi-Fi videocassette recorders from Lowe Marschalk, New York. The ad's use of concentrated color, especially within the confines of the tv screen, makes it hard to miss. An excellent use of spot color caught our eyes in this ad for the Red Cross Greater New York Blood Bank via Doyle Dane Bernbach. As it happened, the blood bank ran into a serious shortage of blood smack in the middle of a serious water shortage in the New York metropolitan area. Art director: Neil Raphan. Copywriter: Judy Protas.

DYR, Los Angeles, used a particularly effective headline. The goose egg grabbed our attention immediately and quickly ushered DYR's effort into the Best of Press category. Associate creative director: Judy Johnson; art director: John Lee Wong; Copywriter: Ken Fitzgerald.

Best of Press selections are made by a committee of three: Hank Simons, vp-creative director of the Newspaper Advertising Bureau; James Dunaway, vp-information at the bureau, and William F. Ad spending jumps 12.2%

New York—Advertiser spending in major-market daily newspapers in 16 categories increased 12.2% in October compared with a year ago, according to the Flash Report prepared for Advertising Age by Media Records.

Total advertiser spending in the measured categories in 29 daily and 23 Sunday newspapers in 15 major markets increased $31.7 million to $290.7 million.

Ten of 16 categories posted increases.

A 17.8% increase in spending by department stores during October led the way, putting October spending above the $92 million mark.

Food stores increased spending 26% to $31 million; general merchandise stores hiked spending 10.7% to $39.9 million, and radio-tv-phonograph and record retailers raised ad spending 21.4% to $17.7 million.

Among other categories posting large dollar gains were airlines, up 36.5% to $18.9 million; new passenger car sellers, up 25.9% to $15 million, and banks and trust companies, up 25.4% to $9 million.

Other gainers included public service utilities and communications, up 5.2% to $7.3 million; stock, bond and investment houses, up 52.2% to $2.5 million, and camera-photo supplies and services dealers, up 57.3% to $597,002.

Among the declining categories were amusements, down 9.4% to $24.6 million; publishing and media, down 3.3% to $13.4 million; cigarets, down 7.6% to $8.1 million; computer stores and suppliers, down 13.3% to $4.9 million; alcoholic beverages, down 19.7% to $2.8 million, and computers, equipment and services, down 42% to $2.6 million.#

Telemarketing rings in new business era

OVERVIEW

Even a forward-thinking individual like Alexander Graham Bell couldn't have imagined the enormous impact his invention would have on the way people do business.

Telemarketing—the art and science of marketing goods and services through telephone contact—like a good wine, required aging.

Ford Motor Co., Dearborn, Mich., conducted the first major telemarketing campaign in 1962 to find out when 20 million households were planning to buy a new car. The program was created by Murray Roman, founder of the telemarketing industry.

Twenty-five years later, telemarketing has matured into a vital marketing tool.

Direct marketing methods

Method	($ billion)
Telemarketing	$65
Catalogs	$37
Direct mail	$19
Media marketing (print & electronics)	$19
Total	$140

Source: Ernan Roman Direct Marketing

A breakdown of direct-marketing purchases by Michael Allen Co., Rowayton, Conn., places telemarketing at the top of the list. The strategic marketing company estimates telemarketing generated $65 billion in sales in 1983.

Telemarketing represents 46% of direct-marketing purchases, although initial consumer contact is made primarily through catalogs, mail or other media.

Part of telemarketing's growth can be attributed to the changing economics of direct response marketing. The average U.S. sales call now costs more than $250, and 5.5 contacts are needed to close the sale. A professional telephone communicator can make three to seven business contacts an hour at a cost of $7 to $15 per contact.

In the consumer market, professional outbound telephone marketers average seven to 12 consumer contacts per hour at $2.50 to $4 for each completion.

Although telemarketing programs have shown a profit without a coordinated direct mail or media advertising campaign, the programs almost always were directed at the company's existing customers. The individuals already had been influenced by the company's combined marketing efforts.

Often, telemarketing has been viewed as an add-on to a larger marketing strategy, brought in at the last minute in an attempt to salvage a failing campaign. This tactic is changing, however. Telemarketing is becoming an integral part of strategic marketing from a plan's inception.

For optimal results, management should incorporate the broadest range of media available, testing combinations until the most successful strategy becomes clear. Successfully integrating telemarketing with other marketing media requires attention to a number of issues, some entirely distinctive to telemarketing.

Other issues are familiar to the experienced marketer, but they take on new complexities and risks when considered in light of the expense, immediacy, personal nature, reach and power of telemarketing. And juggling four or five different media in a coordinated effort requires a talented manager. It takes energy to create synergy, but it pays.#

Glossary

Inbound center—A telemarketing facility, usually equipped with an 800 toll-free number, used to receive telephone calls. The same facility often is used for several purposes.

On/Off Network—Not all specialized common carriers provide service to all locations. "On network" calls are those placed to locations the carrier serves. "Off network" calls are those that must be shunted to another carrier. With most services, on network calls are cheaper.

Outbound center—A telemarketing facility used to make telephone sales calls to prospective clients.

Resale carrier—A company that purchases large blocks of telephone service from a specialized common carrier and then resells it in smaller pieces to individual users.

Specialized common carrier—A provider of long-distance telephone service such as AT&T, MCI Communications Corp. or GTE Sprint Communications.

In-script tv ads get Brazilian boost

By JULIA MICHAELS

SAO PAULO—It's a common practice here for brand-name products to pop up within the context of a tv show's story line, but a Brazilian undergarment marketer has taken that scenario a step further.

Valerin Industrias Textil, Brazil's largest marketer of women's panties, has become the talk of the town because an outdoor board advertising its Hope panties has become part of the story line in a popular prime time soap opera.

In the U.S., a combination of network tv policies and federal laws effectively prevents such practices in commercial tv.

But not in Brazil. The program, "Roque Santeiro," is the alltime most popular soap opera or telenovela, with daily audiences often as big as 80% of tv households.

The setting for the show is the fictional town of Asa Branca, a microcosm of Brazil, in which the lives of the country's liberals, conservatives, rich, poor, blacks, whites, young and old are portrayed in allegorical form.

The campaign, created by Agnelo Pacheco Criacão & Propaganda, was launched on the tv show with an outdoor board for Hope panties appearing in the main square of Asa Branca.

Outdoor boards for Hope panties appeared during episodes of Brazil's prime time soap opera "Roque Santeiro" after being written into the show's story line. The copy reads "The panty that turns men's heads. Hope panties."

The board shows a woman wearing the panties, with the copy "The panty that turns men's heads. Hope panties."

Over a period of nine weekly episodes, the board developed a story of its own within the context of the program.

It started when one of the characters, a heavy drinker, became convinced that the woman in the ad was swiveling her hips at him. In one scene, he even climbed up on the board to see what the trick was, muttering, "One of those Japanese computers."

In following episodes, the upright ladies of the town were scandalized by the board and held a protest to get rid of it.

In another show, a rich rancher complained that Hope panties are so popular in Asa Branca that he couldn't find a pair to buy. That set off viewer speculation over which of his girlfriends he was buying them for.

Retailers were sold beforehand on the idea with an eight-page brochure explaining how the ads would appear on the show.

A month after the campaign was launched on tv, real outdoor boards appeared throughout Brazil. They were so popular that a hotel asked for a panty board to decorate its New Year's Eve ball, which had "Roque Santeiro" as its theme.

Agency president Agnelo Pacheco said the campaign built slowly. In the first episode, the outdoor board appeared for only three seconds. A survey revealed that of 100 people who saw the board during the show only about 22 remembered the brand name. But after the third episode, more than 90 recalled the board.

"This is how [in-script] advertising can come into the story without violating the author, the story and especially the viewer," Mr. Pacheco said, adding that most in-script advertisements are no more than badly camouflaged commercials that insult the viewer's intelligence.

The campaign was launched in October, when the company sold 180,000 dozen panties. By November, a new sales record of 220,000 dozen had been reached.

Baseball looks to Japan

By JOHN WOLFE

Major League Baseball has hired Dentsu, Japan's largest advertising agency, to snare Japanese corporate sponsors for American baseball teams.

"We're trying to bring some marketing strength to those clubs that have not had the benefit of major corporate support," said Joel Rubenstein, exec vp-corporate marketing for MLB, which is composed of all 26 professional baseball teams in North America.

Mr. Rubenstein said the teams include the Cleveland Indians, the Seattle Mariners, the Pittsburgh Pirates, the Texas Rangers, the Milwaukee Brewers and others.

"These are important markets, but they don't get the same attention as Chicago, New York or Los Angeles," he said.

Other sources said potential sponsors include marketers of camera film, watches and audio-visual equipment, and that Fuji Film is one of the first to be considering a sponsorship.

Mr. Rubenstein said any corporate sponsors Dentsu can secure will have a variety of sponsorship plans from which to choose, but any deal would have to include all 26 major league teams.

"We want them to make an equal commitment to all 26 clubs," he said. "They can't come in and just do an All-Star game promotion or a World Series promotion."

Under the plan, a corporate sponsor would have to invest a minimum of $5 million. Of that, $2 million would go for the sponsorship of club-related events designed to generate attendance, such as special promotional days or nights at the 26 ballparks.

Another $2 million would be spent on advertising, in which the sponsor can advertise and promote its association with the teams in print and tv commercials, as well as in ads in the teams' programs and yearbooks.

The sponsor also would have to pay an annual $1 million "rights fee" to MLB, Mr. Rubenstein said.

Dentsu also is negotiating with Japanese tv stations for the possible telecast of certain MLB games or related film properties as well as arranging for the licensing of team-related products like jackets and caps, Mr. Rubenstein said.

Big shops feasting on midsize agencies

By VALERIE MACKIE

U.S. multinational ad agencies are gobbling up medium-size shops at such a fast pace around the world that industry experts question whether such agencies are headed for extinction.

Their concerns are prompted by a barrage of acquisitions outside the U.S. by multinational agencies in 1985 (see chart at right). Many of the agencies being acquired are "medium size" in each country, though the billings of each agency vary with the size of that country's ad industry.

"There are a lot of agencies in the middle that are afraid that unless they do something they will disappear—it's the school of paranoia," said John Bernbach, president of New York-based Doyle Dane Bernbach's international division. "They are worried that if they don't happen to be a sexy, young, hot shop, they better link up with a stable multinational."

DDB is negotiating to buy agencies in Brazil, Greece, Italy, Malaysia and Thailand and to start up its own agency in Portugal in March.

"You've either got to be very big, or small and have a special niche in your own country," said Wim Slootweg, a native of Holland and general manager at Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago. "The medium-size agency is dead."

Local agencies, many of which have fought off multinational overtures in the past, admit they are having trouble competing for pan-regional accounts with the major international shops.

Grandfield Rork Collins in London is a typical example of the changes going on among locally owned agencies.

Once a strong, fiercely independent shop, GRC tried to set up an international network, called GRC International, by linking up with medium-size agencies in other countries, such as Ally & Gargano in the U.S. But

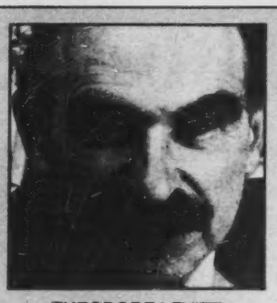
BLAIR VEDDER



THEODORE LEVITT

Global marketing: Love it or Levitt?

From a speech by Blair Vedder, retired chairman-ceo of Needham Harper Worldwide's international division, on Jan. 17 to the mid-America chapter of the International Advertising Assn.:

"If. . .there has been some lessening of the marketing and ad communities' enthusiasm for. . .international opportunities, the cause must include something more than. . .economics and politics.

"One of those additional causes could be the actions of one rather obscure man about three years ago, incredible as that may sound.

"The man was Dr. Theodore Levitt, and the action was his publication of a controversial thesis on global brands. There is no question that Dr. Levitt's intentions were above reproach, but I now wish he had stayed in bed and never written his paper.

"Instead of clarifying issues, Dr. Levitt's views have intensified doubts about international marketing, which were already fed by concerns over the strong dollar, political upheaval. . .tariffs and other impediments to constructive international market thinking.

"I happen to believe that Dr. Levitt's predictions about global brands were right. But I am afraid he was wrong in offering them up as he did. I think he was wrong for three reasons:

- "First, he presented his forecast not as a probability but almost as a commandment engraved in stone. If you want to invite contrariness in people, that's probably the best way to do it. . .
- "Second, the evidence Dr. Levitt used to support his idea of global brands as the wave of the future simply did not fit with most international marketers' experience with consumer behavior as that behavior exists today in much of the Western world. If you want to convince a significant number of people about the shape of things to come, you must show them a few clear examples of that future shape in their present experience.
- "Third, Dr. Levitt wrote of his envisioned future in a way that implied it would occur tomorrow, not sometime in the next decade or so. When a predicted 'tomorrow' comes and goes and nothing changes, people lose faith that what was predicted will ever occur.

"I now wish that instead of pressing that future on us he had allowed more time for it to evolve, for events to bring the future into sharper focus."#

Coke and Pepsi in hot U.K. cherry cola battle

By LAUREL WENTZ

LONDON—The cherry cola war has spread to the U.K., where Cherry Pepsi and Cherry Coke are poised to enter a fierce battle for market share.

Both colas were launched throughout the U.K. two weeks ago without test marketing (AA, Jan. 20). The launch of Cherry Coke by Coca-Cola Co., Atlanta, was expected, but the rollout of Cherry Pepsi by PepsiCo, Purchase, N.Y., was a surprise.

Cherry Pepsi entered Canada in November, just two days before test-marketing began there for Cherry Coke (AA, Nov. 11).

Cherry Pepsi has yet to be introduced in the U.S., and the U.K. launch is seen as a coordinated effort by PepsiCo to meet its chief rival head-on in the cherry cola market outside the U.S.

Cherry Coke was believed to be preparing to enter a test market in the U.K. when the national rollout began Jan. 15 without a test.

Robert Wilkinson, Coca-Cola's director for external affairs in Northern Europe, denied that the test-market phase of the launch was dropped because of the imminent arrival of Cherry Pepsi.

"There was no test because the nature of the research for Great Britain was sufficiently encouraging. . .that the company felt it was time to go ahead with the national introduction," Mr. Wilkinson said.

PepsiCo also denied that the U.K. rollout of Cherry Pepsi is due to Cherry Coke's offensive.

"It's unusual, but it represents the company's continuing commitment to build the U.K. market," said John Derkach, PepsiCo's U.K. marketing manager.

PepsiCo has no immediate plans to launch Cherry Pepsi in other European markets, said Peter Kendall, regional vp for Northern Europe.

Cherry Pepsi will get print, tv and cinema advertising, starting in early March, via J. Walter Thompson Co., Mr. Derkach said.

"The budget is still to be determined, but it will be substantial," he said. Other sources said the campaign might carry the same "Grab a taste of the good life" theme as the Canadian ads, also via JWT.

Cherry Coke ads, scheduled to break in early February via McCann-Erickson, will feature the tag line "Cherry Coke turns your world upside down," sources said. The campaign will include tv, cinema and print advertising.#

Tv station in Peru sells shares

By ANNE ARRARTE

LIMA—For just a $1 share in a fledgling Peruvian tv station, investors will be able to participate in the station's game shows and lotteries after it goes on the air in July.

On top of that, the investors will also receive dividends in three years.

Peruvian entrepreneur Ricardo Belmont—the Jerry Lewis of Peru, when it comes to telethons—has hit on the novel fund-raising tactic for RBC-TV, his latest dreamchild.

Mr. Belmont formerly owned Channel 11 in Peru, but the military government expropriated it in 1968. Since then, the government has returned his broadcasting license, but the $2 million start-up costs are prohibitive for a go-it-alone comeback.

A $270,000 radio and print fund-raising ad campaign via McCann-Erickson emphasizes "the idea of triumph over the odds," Mr. Belmont said.

"Let's be partners. Together, let's make RBC Television," ad copy says. To date, the ads have raised $870,000, coming from 37,000 "partners."

Mr. Belmont's radio spots have capitalized on his fame as a telethon host. Over the last five years, he has turned a small national telethon for Peru's handicapped children into a live 48-hour marathon in which funds are raised for children throughout Latin America.

Mr. Belmont said he will have spent at least $500,000 on advertising by the time RBC-TV goes on the air. He needs to raise $1.6 million by then.

The remaining $400,000 of the station's $2 million start-up costs, plus advertising fees, are being absorbed by a small group of Belmont family members.

"RBC-TV will air in the greater Lima area and will have between 60% and 70% local production—largely game shows, sports events and news," Mr. Belmont said.

Local ad executives believe RBC-TV has a fighting chance.

"Belmont has a well known tv personality and therefore brings a powerful tv talent to his station," said Jorge Penny, an account director at McCann. "He also owns two highly successful radio stations and has lots of broadcast experience."# the network soon fell apart when Federal Express Corp., which was supposed to be the network's chief account, went with McCann-Erickson instead and GRC eventually sold out to Saatchi & Saatchi.

In Germany there isn't a single local agency in the top 20 that's not linked to a multinational shop. As a result, multinationals are looking to buy the second-tier agencies. Many of these agencies for years have remained staunchly independent, but the lure of huge sums of money may be changing their outlooks.

"More and more companies are now thinking in European terms, and the expected satellite tv means that an agency of a certain size needs an international network," said Michael Menzel, an original partner of Scholz & Friends, Hamburg. The agency, made up of principals who broke away from Team/BBDO in Germany to gain independence, last year sold 51% of its operation to Ted Bates Worldwide, New York.

"Some of the sellers get into a last-minute panic, thinking they'll never again receive such a good offer," said Willi Schalk, exec vp at BBDO International.

The competition among the multinational agencies, which are seeking to fill the holes in their networks and improve their international rankings, also has elements of panic.

"Everyone is trying to become a global agency by trying to fill in their network," said John O'Toole, ex-chairman of Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago. "There are going to be only a handful of agencies that are truly global that can handle the global accounts, and everyone is trying to become one. There is a fear that if you don't fill in your holes, you'll be left behind."

In the future there may only be eight agencies that qualify as "global," Mr. O'Toole said, adding, "Clients are saying, 'We want you there,' so we go."

He cited the example of FCB buying the NCK network in Europe and the Siboney network in South America because of pressure from Colgate-Palmolive Co.

Last year, FCB bought a minority share of an agency in the Philippines and has signed a nonequity deal with Yaratim in Istanbul, Turkey.

Another reason for expansion is that existing clients of international agencies have slowed down plans to increase ad spending. This is an indication that future agency growth will have to come from new clients.

"It used to be that half your growth would come from existing clients around the world, and the other half from new clients, but that's not true anymore," said one executive at a top U.S.-based international agency.

More growth must come from new clients, he said, and the fastest way to gain new clients is to buy an agency.

In some places, like Brazil, this can mean buying into as many as four agencies, as J. Walter Thompson Co., New York, plans to do.

But not everyone agrees with the theory that medium-size agencies are dead.

"The middle-size agency is not dead," said TBWA chairman Bill Tragos. "I know that's what everyone says, but I think what we're going to end up with is a department store—small, medium, large and extra-large agencies."

"All this buying of agencies is because everyone is betting the dollar will go down [further]—now the bargains are great," Mr. Tragos said.

If the dollar continues to go down, he said, it will get more expensive to buy agencies overseas. In contrast, the earnings of overseas shops will look more profitable when stronger local currencies are converted to dollars for U.S. reporting purposes.#

Local business books healthy

By JENNIFER PENDLETON

RANCHO MIRAGE, CAL.—While most national business publications are experiencing ad linage drops in the soft economy of early 1986, regional business newspapers and magazines are showing healthy gains, according to Joe Cappo, newly installed president of the Assn. of Area Business Publications.

J. Cappo

At the AABP's winter meeting here, Mr. Cappo, publisher of Crain's Chicago Business, said ad revenues at 90% of AABP's 86 members are up. And, he pointed out, the estimated 200 publications of this kind in the U.S. have a combined circulation that exceeds the Wall Street Journal's 2 million.

While startups aren't appearing at the breakneck pace of the early 1980s, the field is still growing at a fast rate—a reflection of the decline of daily newspapers and the public's hunger for specialized information, particularly local financial news, according to Mr. Cappo.

Regional business magazines or newspapers, well established in the top 20 U.S. markets, now are starting up in the smaller, second 20 cities.

Are these markets large enough to sustain these publications? Mr. Cappo said, "It hasn't been proven yet." He declined to predict when the inevitable shakeout among publications will occur.

Don Miller, president of Scripps-Howard Business Journals, publisher of 11 newspapers of the genre, was more specific. The shakeout will happen in two to three years, in both large and small markets, as competition for advertising dollars intensifies, he said. And many of the undercapitalized independents currently in the field will either sell to larger companies or go out of business. He believes the trend toward consolidation will eventually leave only a few major competitors in the field.

During the four-day meeting, some 100 registrants at the meeting heard speakers on a variety of practical topics, such as direct mail and the perils and promise of going public.

Saul Fructhendler, president, Louis & Saul Advertising, Santa Monica, Cal., advised the group to take advantage of negotiated ad rates and barter. He also described area business magazines as "one of the most underadvertised, underpromoted businesses I've encountered."

He urged the members to promote their publications with direct marketing and, in some cases, tv advertising.#

Pabst owner's ad slams ads

By SCOTT HUME

New wrinkles have appeared in the curious case of Pabst Brewing Co. Paul Kalmanovitz, the reclusive beer baron who bought Milwaukee-based Pabst last year and immediately fired both its national agencies (AA, March 25), has taken out page ads in Milwaukee dailies defending himself and his disdain for advertising.

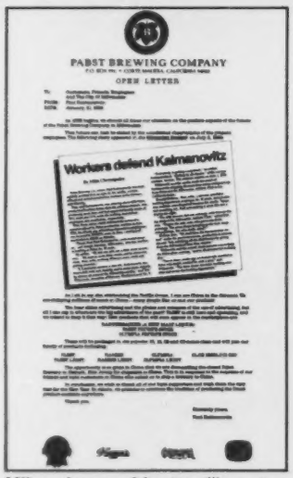
The ad also announces plans for "dismantling the closed Pabst Brewery in Newark, N.J., for shipment to China."

A decade ago, Pabst was the nation's third-largest brewer, with shipments of more than 21 million bbls. a year. Analysts estimate Pabst's output last year to have been slightly more than 9 million (AA, Jan. 20).

In the "open letter" ad to "customers, friends, employes and the city of Milwaukee," Mr. Kalmanovitz suggests attention be focused on the "positive aspects of the Pabst Brewing Co. of Milwaukee."

Also included is a reprint of a July 2 article from the Milwaukee Sentinel quoting brewery workers' praise for Mr. Kalmanovitz.

One of the positive aspects he points to is Pabst's intention soon to introduce three new products: Olympia Private Stock, Pabst Private Stock and Randersacker malt liquor. No mention is made of Steinbrau and Steinbrau Light, two brands Pabst officials earlier had confirmed have gone on shelves this month (AA, Jan. 13).



PABST BREWING COMPANY

OPEN LETTER

Workers defend Kalmanovitz

Milwaukee residents still are trying to decipher this "open letter" ad from Pabst Brewing owner Paul Kalmanovitz. Asher-Gould, Los Angeles, handles.

After purchasing Pabst, Mr. Kalmanovitz ordered the abrupt firing of national agencies McCann-Erickson, New York, and Young & Rubicam, Chicago.

Asher-Gould, Los Angeles, which handles other brands owned by Mr. Kalmanovitz, has been assigned the Pabst account and created the "open letter" ad.

"You hear about advertising and the pluses and minuses of the use of advertising," Mr. Kalmanovitz says in the ad, "but all I can say is where are the big advertisers of the past? Pabst is still here and operating, and we intend to keep it that way."

At press time, major beer advertisers Anheuser-Busch, St. Louis; Miller Brewing Co., Milwaukee, and Adolph Coors Co., Golden, Colo., also were still operating. But industry analysts and observers long ago stopped trying to figure out Mr. Kalmanovitz.

The announced plan to ship a brewery to China ("This is in response to the requests of our friends and loyal customers in China, who asked us to ship a brewery to China") drew skepticism from those quarters.

"What that probably means is that he's found a buyer for used brewing equipment," said John Collopy, an analyst at Robert Baird & Co., Milwaukee.

Ad copy implies Pabst is still a Milwaukee company, but the ad's letterhead lists Corte Madera, Cal., Mr. Kalmanovitz' home base.#

Procter & Gamble's Pampers.

Coca-Cola's percentage of first mentions in the soft-drink category fizzled again for the sixth consecutive month, falling in December 3.6 percentage points to 33.6% of first mentions. Coke's share peaked at 53.4% of first mentions in July following the introduction of new Coke and the reintroduction of Coca-Cola Classic.

Pepsi kept the No. 2 position with 28.6% of first mentions. 7UP moved into the No. 3 spot from No. 5 with a 3.2% share, Pepsi's Slice garnered a 1.9% share for fourth position and Diet Coke fell to fifth with 1.5% of first mentions.

In December, 1,000 adults were questioned by telephone. Under adWatch methodology, an increase or decrease of 2.8 percentage points is considered statistically significant and attributable to more than sample variation.

Among other significant changes in the December survey results:

- E. & J. Gallo Winery added 4 percentage points to its share of first mentions in the wine category, rising to 10.2% of first mentions, on the strength of its highly stylized spots (AA, Dec. 16). The spots feature copyless, pastoral scenes of people drinking wine, set to music by Vangelis, best known for the "Chariots of Fire" movie score. Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco, handles.

Despite the gain, Gallo still is No. 2 in the category behind Villa Banfi's Riunite brand, which last month was down slightly to a 12.3% share of first mentions.

Behind Gallo, in the No. 3 spot, are ads for its own Bartles & Jaymes' wine cooler, which received 3% of first mentions. California Cooler placed fourth with a 1.1% share, and Cella wines was fifth with 1.0% of first mentions.

- United Airlines and American Airlines each dropped 3 percentage points in their share of first mentions in the airline category. United dropped to 12.1%, still good enough for the No. 1 spot, while American fell to 11.5% of first mentions. While both carriers offered cut rates for holiday fliers, neither used much paid advertising to announce the cuts, due to the publicity their offers generated.

Delta moved up to the No. 3 spot from No. 5 in November with 9.2% of first mentions, bumping TWA into the No. 4 position with an 8.6% share. Eastern dropped into fifth with an 8% share.#

TULSA, OKLA.—Composite Enterprises has acquired Kent Toys, Kent, O., best known for its licensed Moodies cartoon characters. Composite will assume the Kent Toys name next month.

For the Record

U.S. MARINE CORPS, Washington, last week issued a "solicitation of interest" to determine whether any agencies want to challenge incumbent J. Walter Thompson USA for its $15 million recruiting account. JWT is believed to have a solid grip on the account. The Marines asked agencies to respond by late March.

THE $3.2 BILLION takeover bid that Arthur Guinness & Sons P.L.C. announced last week for Distillers Co. is expected to be referred to an independent, nonbinding agency that makes recommendations to the government on antitrust complaints. Guinness' offer for Distillers, the world's leading marketer of scotch whisky (including Johnnie Walker and Dewar's brands in the U.S.), is the largest takeover bid in U.K. history and would put Guinness among the U.K.'s 10 largest companies.

JEFFREY MARTIN INC., Union, New Jersey, has bought worldwide rights to the Zizanie men's fragrance and skin treatment line from Beecham Cosmetics, Chicago. The estimated $100,000 ad budget moves from Zwiren & Wagner, Chicago, to Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, New York, one of Martin's agencies.

WEIGHTMAN GROUP has been formed as an $80 million marketing communications company in Philadelphia. The move follows the acquisition by Weightman Advertising, a $50 million shop, of a controlling interest in Schaefer Advertising, a $25 million agency in Valley Forge, Pa., and its purchase of Roska Direct Marketing, a $4 million shop in North Wales, Pa. All three will operate as Weightman Group subsidiaries, as will Weightman/Schaefer PR, which combines the two agencies' public relations units.

FOSTER & KLEISER, Los Angeles, will be sold for $710 million to Gerard Joyce, president of Patrick Media Group, Scranton, N.J., it was announced last week. F&K is the outdoor advertising unit of Metromedia, Secaucus, N.J. Through F&K, Metromedia and a partnership manage more than 40,000 boards.

WILSON SPORTING GOODS, River Grove, Ill., on Jan. 19 teed off its first ads from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Chicago, during the Bob Hope Chrysler Classic golf tournament. The two tv spots for Ultra golfballs will be followed with ads for other golf and tennis equipment. DMB&B won the account this fall from Leo Burnett USA (AA, Nov. 4).

AMERICAN AIRLINES, Dallas, has named Young & Rubicam's Wunderman, Ricotta & Kline subsidiary, New York, to handle the direct-marketing assignment for its AAdvantage frequent-flier program. It formerly was handled in-house. The project does not include American's new Senior SAAvers Club, which is being handled by American's primary agency, Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt/Southwest.

A.H. ROBINS CO.'S $5 million notification program centering on its Dalkon Shield intrauterine contraceptive (AA, Jan. 6) has so far resulted in 20,000-to-30,000 cards and letters from consumers saying they intend to file injury claims. The court-ordered print and tv ads say notification of claims must be filed with the U.S. bankruptcy court by April 30. Some 6,000 cases and claims alleging injuries are already pending. Richmond, Va.-based Robins' in-house shop, Mil-Mor Advertising, placed the ads.

NBC-TV will win the 1985-86 prime time Nielsen homes ratings crown, predict BBDO and Gardner Advertising's Paul Schulman Co., both New York. BBDO expects NBC to average a seasonlong 17.7 rating to CBS' 17.3 and ABC's 15.8. The agencies see no "dramatic" ratings impact from the schedule fixes so far.

FORD MOTOR CO., Dearborn, Mich., has started a nationwide education campaign focusing on air bags, as a prelude to offering the safety devices as $815 options on Ford Tempo and Mercury Topaz beginning in March. The campaign will include seminars, printed literature and the training of dealer service departments. Ad plans have not yet been determined. J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, handles the Ford division and Young & Rubicam has the Lincoln-Mercury unit.

SCHERING-PLOUGH'S Plough USA unit, Memphis, Tenn., this spring will introduce two improved Di-Gel antacid formulas: Advanced Formula Di-Gel tablets with additional calcium and Low-Sodium Di-Gel liquid. Network radio and print ads start in April via the Bloom Agency, Dallas.

ACCOUNT ACTIVITY: Abert, Newhoff & Burr, Los Angeles, picked up two accounts when it recently hired Bill Vogel in the new post of exec vp-managing partner. The $1.3 million Tahiti Tourist Board account and the $1 million UTA French Airlines account followed Mr. Vogel from Liebowitz, Olshever, Vogel & Baruch, where he had been a partner...Pizza Hut, Wichita, Kan., to Kobs & Brady, Chicago, first agency for direct-marketing programs supporting the chain's home-delivery business, now testing in 10 markets.

WORTH NOTING: Ogilvy Group, New York, has declared a 3-for-2 split on its common stock, meant to "increase the marketability of the company's common shares and make them more attractive to smaller investors," says chairman-ceo William Phillips...Northwest Orient Airlines, St. Paul, Minn., has signed Miami Dolphins coach Don Shula to join former Minnesota Vikings quarterback Fran Tarkenton as spokesmen for its $8 million-to-$10 million business traveler campaign (AA, Jan. 20). Grey Advertising, Minneapolis, handles...D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Bloomfield Hills, Mich., and Marketing Services Bureau, Southfield, are developing a tv public service campaign for the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, Washington...The average print ad cost 8% more to produce in 1985 than in '84, according to an annual survey by Trout & Ries, New York...Chicago Sun-Times on Jan. 31 will publish the last of its two afternoon "Red Streak" editions, leaving the city without an all-day newspaper. Publisher Robert Page cited economic reasons for the demise of the late-markets and final-markets editions. Some layoffs are expected. The Chicago Tribune last year dropped its "Green Streak" final (AA, Aug. 19, et seq.)...Times Mirror Co.'s New York Newsday today starts offering advertisers a New York-only zone...CBS Magazines, New York, denies persistent reports that it is selling Car & Driver, and perhaps one of its cycle magazines, to Penthouse International's Bob Guccione. "None of our magazines is for sale," says president Peter Diamandis. A Penthouse spokeswoman says that company is "negotiating to acquire a number of magazines."

MARKETING TO THE ARAB WORLD

Success requires keen insight into the culture

SUSAN HARRIS

One of tv's best writers scores with 'Golden Girls'

JAMES BRADY

Dick and Jane return, but it's not the same

Thursday

Dealing with success

"Golden Girls," one of the hottest new shows of 1985, shows tv is finally ready for Susan Harris. Years ago she made a conscious decision to be more than just another pretty face—which she is—but to be a writer of "important" tv shows. Since co-writing her first script, a "...Then Came Bronson" episode in 1969, she's managed to offend and outrage people by writing tv stories about abortion and more. Her previous creations, "Soap" and the short-lived "Fay," caused an uproar in the 1970s. But they were tame compared to "Golden Girls." And she is not quite sure how to react to the newfound acclaim. See Page 4.

Another Super Bowl story

Super Bowl mania has crossed the Atlantic and settled in the U.K. and parts of continental Europe. In the U.K., an estimated 4 million to 5 million viewers were expected to watch the Chicago Bears take on the New England Patriots when the contest was televised live at 10 p.m. Jan. 26. Elsewhere, about 5.3 million subscribers to Sky Channel, Rupert Murdoch's pan-European cable tv service, had access to live coverage of the game in 13 European nations. See Page 8.

Special Report— Marketing to the Arab World

Arabian Peninsula oil states are suffering from a loss of oil revenues. But smart marketers still are tapping the resources of the Arab world, a region dependent on imports for many items. Special Report examines some of the importers, customs, native companies, successful products and advertising, starting on Page 9.

Ford axes shuttle ads

DEARBORN, MICH.—Ford Motor Co.'s Ford division is pulling all Aerostar advertising related to the U.S. space shuttle program in the wake of the Jan. 28 in-flight explosion of shuttle Challenger. Tv ads were canceled effective immediately and print ad schedules still reachable were suspended. The campaign, comparing the new minivan's aerodynamic silhouette to that of the shuttle, would have been phased out soon anyway, a Ford spokesman said. The shuttle-related ads, via J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, broke late last year. JWT is scrambling to speed up development of a replacement campaign. Several are said to be on the drawing board.

Razors slice into market

NORCROSS, GA.—Wilkinson Sword is rolling national with the new Retractor Twin, the company's first twin-blade disposable razor. The brand will get network tv spots, couponing and print ads in major consumer magazines, via Burton-Campbell, Atlanta. Separately, Boston-based Gillette Co.'s safety razor division next month will break tv spots for its new MicroTrac twin-blade disposable razor, which is now rolling national. BBDO, New York, handles.

Vick rises at Ammirati

NEW YORK—Edward Vick has been named president of Ammirati & Puris, while continuing as chief operating officer. He succeeds Martin Puris, who remains chief executive officer but becomes co-chairman with creative director Ralph Ammirati. Mr. Vick joined the agency in 1983 from a senior vp post at Ogilvy & Mather.

Chase breaks image ads

NEW YORK—Chase Manhattan Bank next week will break an estimated $10 million consumer banking campaign promoting bank employes' talents in meeting individual customer needs. Theme is "Chase. The experience shows." The long-delayed multimedia effort is the first broad image campaign for Chase from Scali, McCabe, Sloves, which took over the account in late 1984 from Wells, Rich, Greene (AA, Dec. 31, '84).

Almond review advances

SACRAMENTO, CAL.—California Almond Growers Exchange has narrowed the review for its $8 million account to six agencies: Incumbent Busse & Cummins, Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, Marschalk Co., McCann-Erickson and Hal Riney & Partners, all San Francisco, and Needham Harper Worldwide, Los Angeles. A decision is expected March 1. CAGE also has assigned $450,000 in Blue Diamond almond butter business to Runyon Saltzman here, the first agency to handle. The product starts testing in April here and in Columbus, O., and Denver (AA, Jan. 9).

MicroAge arrives on tv

Other than your own clients, what were the most creative and effective commercials during the Super Bowl telecast? Here are the picks from agency execs in the Super Bowl cities, Chicago and Boston.

Lou Centlivre, executive vp-managing director creative, Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago: "The John Hancock spots are immaculately cast. The dialogue is so real; it lives up to its theme, 'Real Life, Real Answers.' Northwestern Mutual, 'The Quiet Company' should shut up until it finds a decent agency. McDonald's (McD.L.T). spots have half the firepower that they once had. The account is in the wrong creative hands. The Herb spots are depressing; who'd want to be associated with that guy?"

L. CENTLIVRE

Dick Pantano, creative director, Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston: "Clearly McDonald's stuff did more to sell the McD.L.T. It was amusing, interesting and a clear demonstration of what the product was and what the packaging was all about. It will bury Herb and all that."

David Fairman, president and chief creative officer, Gray/Chicago: "I look for two things in advertising: Simplicity and drama that's relevant. Two Super Bowl spots that stood out were the underwater Timex spot and the Michelin ads with the kids sitting in the tire. Both touched an emotional nerve as opposed to being strictly factual and both had clear strategies that weren't cluttered with extraneous idea. McDonald's McD.L.T. spots, though, were the most expensive flaming nonsequiturs ever presented."

D. FAIRMAN

Steve Cosmopulos, creative director and chairman, Cosmopulos, Crowley & Daly, Boston: "There were several that got their money's worth: New York Air, John Hancock, Budweiser's Dalmation, Lite Beer's Halley's Comet and Duroliner's the Hammer. But, the one I wish I'd done was the New York Air spot where the man has his feet around his neck. That was the most exciting, the best of the bunch. In general, though, there were no breakthrough ads. The one that came the closest was Hancock, but only time will tell."

Dennis Berger, exec vp-exec creative director, BBDO, Chicago: In general, I didn't think that much was exciting. It isn't quite like the big surge you get at Olympics time. I didn't see all that much new stuff. What stuck out was the silliness of those McDonald's spots; I don't know what the hell they were doing. They were loudly hooted by my 7, 8 and 13-year-olds. Also, those [Durakon] truck-bed liners. . .I didn't know such a product existed!"

TV AVAILS

A weekly listing of tv programming that still has commercial availabilities open in the next few weeks.

"The People's Court," a half-hour strip, has general time available on a scatter basis for the second and third quarters. Telepictures, New York, is asking $30,000 per 30-second spot. The show has been cleared in 95% of the country and has a projected 9 rating. Already in are Kellogg Co., Quaker Oats and American Home Products.

"Boys' Town: A Miracle of the Heart" has an unspecified number of avails on its prime-time broadcast during the first week of April, when it will be barter-syndicated in 90% of the U.S. via LBS Communications, New York. Rates were not available at press time.

"Footsteps of Giants," also due from LBS as a documentary commemorating the 25th anniversary of the U.S. space program, has several avails. It will be shown during June in fringe and early prime time slots in roughly 100 markets.

"My Friend Liberty," a half-hour special marking the Statue of Liberty's 100th birthday, will air between mid-June and July 4, in prime time access and early fringe time periods. The show, done in clay animation and featuring a doughy-looking Ed Koch as mayor of New York, should be bartered to 100 markets by air-date, according to an LBS representative.

"Strictly Business," a weekly half-hour business series produced and aired by the NBC-TV owned stations group, has avails in its first telecasts beginning in April. The magazine-format show will run in access and Sunday mornings.

"The SFM Holiday Network" has avails in several two-hour movies through early summer, barter-syndicated through SFM Entertainment, New York. "Ten Gentlemen from West Point," to air Jan. 1, Feb. 1 and 2, is sold out. "You're My Everything" has four 30-second units during the Feb. 28, March 1 and 2 showings, while "Springtime in the Rockies" has six 30s on the March 14, 15 and 16 broadcasts. "The First Texan" has seven 30s on the April 18, 19 and 20 play dates, while "A Ticket to Tomahawk" has six 30s on the June 20, 21 and 22 broadcasts. Prices were not available. The movies run primarily in the early afternoon on weekends in 80% of the country. ■

Scheduled radio specials and new programs or syndicated services.

"Profile '86," a monthly series by NBC Radio Entertainment, New York, that features music and interviews with rock's million-selling performers. The show will spotlight The Thompson Twins the weekend of Feb. 21-23. Cleared by an estimated 135 stations.

"Best of Farm Aid: An American Event," an exclusive hourlong special by Westwood One Radio Networks, Los Angeles, and simulcast by Home Box Office, highlights the September, 1985, Farm Aid concert. Artists include Bob Dylan, Willie Nelson, Johnny Cash, Billy Joel and others. Westwood One affiliates will present a special 15-minute salute to the Farm Aid project following the show. Cleared by more than 75 stations.

"Hot Rocks," via United Stations Radio Networks, New York, goes weekly on April 1 after three years a. a 15-week special. The 90-minute show, designed for contemporary hit radio format stations, features the nation's "hottest" hits and interviews. The April 1 launch will feature John Cougar Mellencamp, Starship Survivor and Tears for Fears. Cleared by an estimated 175 stations.

"Weekend Magazine," produced and sponsored by Hearst Magazines, New York, now is being offered over AP Network News to 1,000 stations nationwide. The weekly, 60-second radio broadcasts will feature lifestyle, science and human interest news from among Hearst's 13 top-selling magazines, such as Cosmopolitan, Town & Country, Popular Mechanics and Good Housekeeping. Co-sponsorship available at the local level. Premieres Friday, March 14.

"Legends of Rock," a two-hour program that spotlights the artists who influenced three generations of rock fans, will feature super rock star Paul McCartney on Feb. 14. Cleared by an estimated 135 stations, the ad closing date is Feb. 3. ■

TV POWER SHARES

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decidedly a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

ABC staging ratings revival?

Is there finally a break in the clouds for ABC, the also-ran network?

After a few heart-stopping weeks in which it appeared Dynasty actually might be heading for a time-period loss, the show surged back to a convincing win.

After it seemed MacGyver never would find a home on the schedule, the show pulled out a 1 share point victory. After Moonlighting and Spenser got drubbed by some stiff CBS competition over the past two weeks, both shows scored impressive victories. Even Hotel, which appears to be shrinking to motel status, had a dominant 10-share point win. For the first time in weeks—months?—ABC won both Tuesday and Wednesday evenings.

If you have a soft spot in your heart for underdogs, there's reason to be cheered: CBS cannot crack Tuesday, and NBC's once-vaunted Wednesday lineup has all the vigor of the New England Patriots on Super Bowl Day. Blacke's Magic, the new NBC entry, has no magic wand when it comes to generating audience. The show has lost share steadily since its inception.

CBS' prime-time planners had to have been a little crazy to move Crazy Like a Fox. Strong as the show was on the Sunday schedule, it simply can't anchor CBS on Wednesday. If this show keeps sliding, it'll be gone next season.

Don't expect ABC to sweep Wednesday next time around. Highway to Heaven is back on the schedule (it was preempted last week for the missing children special which got a respectable 25 share).

Tuesday night remains a puzzler for the folks at Black Rock. All those Bugs Bunny and Muppet specials can't build a regular audience at 8 p.m. (ET).

The 9 p.m. movie/special has been bittersweet so far. Miss Teen USA, for example, was demolished last week; but Grand Ole Opry's 60th Anniversary two weeks ago was a Nielsen barnstormer.

Fear of AIDS has led to increased sales of rubber gloves.

AIDS fear poses crisis for some, market for others

By PATRICIA WINTERS

In Alabama, a maker of rubber gloves steps up production to meet demand.

A Norwalk, Conn., company hopes to obtain government approval to tout the anti-Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome benefits of a spray disinfectant.

And in New York, a business consultant tells a major food company that it soon will have to deal with the AIDS question in the marketing of its products.

Fear of AIDS has hit the U.S. consumer marketplace. It already is spurring sales of "barrier" products such as rubber gloves and condoms and soon may change the marketing pitch for other products, such as disinfectants. It also has prompted questionable efforts to profit from the AIDS epidemic.

For the food industry, AIDS may pose a new and delicate problem: How to address unfounded consumer fears that consumption of commercial food products could increase the likelihood of contracting the disease.

In interviews last year, BrainReserve, a New York consulting company, found more than half of 2,000 consumers were concerned about the possibility of transmission of AIDS and other diseases in their daily lives.

"The advent of AIDS and other viral diseases will significantly change the American food marketplace over the next decade," said Faith Popcorn, BrainReserve president, who recently relayed her findings to less-than-delighted executives of Group buys bringing bigger bang to barter

By VERNE GAY

New York—As many as 10 major agencies are negotiating multi-client upfront barter-syndication deals for 1986-87 season worth as much as $500 million, an amount equal to the entire barter-syndication revenues for all of 1985.

Eberstadt Fleming, a Wall Street brokerage house, earlier projected that barter syndication this year will top $641.3 million, indicating that another $140 million could be available in the scatter syndication market.

That figure could be overstated if the network tv market is soft and prices fall, drawing some money now earmarked for syndication back into network tv.

The upfront deals, in which advertisers buy syndicated time for the broadcast year in advance, will be concluded during the next two months. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, soon will open negotiations for a $100 million-plus package for eight clients. Burnett officials say no timetable has been set. BBDO also is planning to enter the market with its own multi-million-dollar "group" buy, although agency officials would not comment. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles reportedly is putting together a package buy for General Foods, the Texize division of Morton-Thiokol and Richardson-Vicks.

This new buying trend has significant ramifications for syndicators as well as the three networks. Not only will barter syndication continue its growth in revenues, but the tv networks will begin their own upfront market this summer with at least $500 million already diverted from the network sphere. Even if ad budgets are up for 1986-87 (the networks generally are predicting 5% revenue growth), the networks could face a much tighter market than last year.

Further, the networks last year wrote more than $2 billion in upfront business, setting the stage for what appeared to be a brisk broadcast sales year. The network scatter market and network sports sales, however, were weak, and the networks suffered one of their

Arledge predicts more sponsored sports

Budweiser Super Bowl?

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

New York—Ready to watch the "Budweiser Super Bowl" on tv? Will baseball's World Series become tv's "Lite Beer World Series"?

Roone Arledge, architect and master strategist of ABC Sports, predicts advertisers increasingly will be brought into network tv rights fee negotiations for major sporting events as investors, in exchange for getting brand names on the event's official title.

This trend, already prevalent in professional tennis and golf, last year broke the college football bowl game barrier with the renamed Sunkist Fiesta Bowl. It will probably take off in earnest as early as the 1986-87 broadcast year, according to Mr. Arledge.

In an interview with Advertising Age, the newly appointed group president of ABC Sports and News also said ABC will take a hard line to roll back National Football League rights fees in 1987-88, even if it means giving up "Monday Night Football."

He said ABC will take the same posture with Major League Baseball, adding that the network would give up "Monday Night Baseball" coverage if the rights package doesn't make economic sense.

Other sources close to ABC said that ABC's new parent company, the financially tight-fisted Capital Cities Communications, was "freaked" when it reviewed the current rights deal between ABC and MLB, which expires after the 1989 season.

"It looked [to Cap Cities] like baseball held a gun to ABC's head and ABC didn't really care," said one source close to the situation. "They'll take a hard line next time around."

Cap Cities' influence on ABC sports rights bidding was first felt late last year when the network, after

Lorillard eyes women smokers with Newport

New York—Lorillard next week will start testing Newport Slim Lights Box 100s in the Hartford, Conn., area. The product, designed to appeal to young adult female smokers, is packaged in a white box with pastel striping and has a white-tipped filter with the pastel-striped motif carried onto the filter barrel. Advertising uses the over-all Newport theme of "Alive with pleasure," via MCA Advertising. The introductory campaign will make "heavy" use of magazines, outdoor boards and Sunday magazines, Lorillard says.

Peugeot looks at HCM; Ogilvy resigns

Lyndhurst, N.J.—Peugeot Motors of America is talking to French agency HCM, which handles Peugeot in Europe, and several other, unidentified shops to replace Ogilvy & Mather, New York, on the $14 million account. O&M's resignation, described by the auto marketer as a "mutual decision," came three months after a top-level administrative shakeup at PMA. O&M is considering pitching for the larger accounts of Toyota and Nissan in the U.S. Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, Torrance, Cal., handles Toyota; William Esty Co., Los Angeles, has Nissan.

AA's Reiss adds title

NEW YORK—Craig Reiss has added the new title of national media editor to his earlier designation as ADVERTISING AGE New York bureau chief, effective Feb. 3.

In a restructuring of the bureau necessitated by the departure of former bureau chief John J. O'Connor, new titles and responsibilities also have been assigned to Stuart J. Elliott, Paul L. Edwards, Nancy Giges and James P. Forkan (AA, Jan. 20). Mr. O'Connor, who ended a distinguished, 16-year career at AA on Jan. 31, will join BBDO on Feb. 10 as senior vp-director of public relations.

Separately, New York-based AA writer Ann Cooper was named senior editor-creative.

As national media editor, bureau chief Mr. Reiss will continue to direct AA's coverage of the broadcasting industry and the development of AA's new MediaWorks news pages in the Monday and Thursday editions.

AA editor Fred Danzig noted that a number of Mr. Reiss' responsibilities as bureau chief will be shared with four others: Mr. Elliott, who has been named to the new post of deputy bureau chief; Mr. Edwards, who succeeds Mr. Reiss as news editor; Ms. Giges, named senior editor-marketing, and Mr. Forkan, named senior editor-administration. The latter two titles are new.

"With John O'Connor's great help and encouragement, we're using this break to redesign the work flow in the bureau," Mr. Danzig said. "We're pleased to be able to promote into new roles some of the top-notch editorial talent that is in our 19-member New York office."

Mr. Reiss joined AA as a broadcasting industry reporter in November, 1982, after two years as an associate editor at Marketing & Media Decisions. He was named news editor in October, 1983, when Mr. O'Connor became bureau chief. A graduate of Oakland University, Rochester, Mich., Mr. Reiss earned a master's degree from Drew University, Madison, N.J., before embarking on his journalism career. In 1976, he won a reporting award at the North Jersey Suburbanite, Cresskill, N.J. He joined the Bergen (N.J.) Record in March, 1979 and M&MD in December, 1980.

Mr. Elliott joined AA as a reporter covering the magazine industry in August, 1982, and was promoted to senior reporter in July, 1984. Before AA, he spent 3½ years at the Detroit Free Press and 4½ years at the Rochester (N.Y.) Times Union. He has bachelor's and master's degrees from Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism.

Ms. Giges, who joined AA in February, 1970, has specialized in covering foods, proprietary and ethical drugs, soft drinks, household cleaning aids and consumer research. She was promoted to senior reporter in June, 1984. A 1968 graduate of the University of Missouri, Ms. Giges received a master's in business administration from Long Island University in 1980.

Before joining AA, she was associate editor with the Continental Insurance Co. publications staff.

Mr. Forkan joined AA in November, 1968 as a reporter, was named a senior editor in January, 1975, and senior editor-broadcast in July, 1977. He primarily covers broadcasting and entertainment-related news. He also reports on such tv-driven categories as toys and licensing and celebrity endorsements. His Sports Marketing column has appeared in AA since October, 1981.

Prior to AA, he was with United Press International, New York, for two years. He is a 1963 graduate of Fordham University. He served in the Army from 1964-66.

On joining AA as a senior editor in July, 1984, Mr. Edwards began broadening the publication's coverage of direct marketing, direct mail, telemarketing and direct response. Before joining AA, he was the founding editor of the monthly magazine Computers in Banking. Earlier, at Fairchild Publications, New York, he was the founding editor of the weekly computer newspaper MIS Week and managing editor of Energy User News. At McGraw-Hill, he was senior editor of Chemical Week. He received a bachelor's degree in history from New York University in 1972.

J. O'Connor

Mr. O'Connor, who succeeds David Williams at BBDO, joined AA as an associate editor in 1969. For more than a decade he reported on the tobacco, alcoholic beverages, foreign automobiles and shaving categories. He was promoted to New York bureau chief in 1983 after having been news editor for six years. Earlier, he was with the Staten Island (N.Y.) Advance and served with the Seventh Infantry Division in Korea. He received a bachelor's degree in English literature from St. Francis College, Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1960.

Ms. Cooper, who joined AA in November, 1984, has written in-depth profiles of key creative people for the Thursday edition and recently added responsibility for producing the twice-monthly section, The Page, which deals with creatives. She was previously based in AA's bureau in London, where she earlier served as an editor with Marketing and Campaign and as a free-lance writer. She has a bachelor's degree in publishing and journalism from Napier College, Edinburgh, Scotland.#

Miller Lite set to take on U.K. beer market. . .

By LAUREL WENTZ

LONDON—Miller Brewing Co. is preparing to meet its chief U.S. rival, Anheuser-Busch, in a head to head battle for market share among finicky British beer-drinkers.

Miller is launching its Lite beer in the London area in early March, eight months after the national rollout of A-B's Budweiser.

British beer-drinkers are notorious for their dislike of ice-cold, light lagers and their preference for heavier, more bitter brews served at room temperature. Nonetheless, both U.S. brewers are investing heavily in ad campaigns designed to lure U.K. drinkers to their brands.

Unlike Budweiser, which is marketed and advertised as the quintessential American beer, Lite will be positioned as a light lager, with the slogan "It ain't heavy, it's Miller Lite," appearing in the tv, radio, outdoor and bus-side advertising campaign by Boase Massimi Pollitt breaking at the beginning of March.

"It's a light lager different from other lagers and happens to come from America," says Graham Stewart-Reed, pr manager of Courage Ltd., the U.K. brewer that is the first Miller licensee outside North America. "We're not trying to put the American theme down people's throats." Mr. Stewart-Reed declined to disclose the advertising budget for the London-area launch.

Courage chose to launch Lite rather than Miller High Life in Britain because "we didn't want a premium lager, as Miller High Life would be here," Mr. Stewart-Reed said. "We didn't want to do a Budweiser."

In the U.K., Budweiser is promoted as "the coolest beer in town" in two popular tv commercials featuring lively, young Americans and shot in Hoboken, N.J.

The campaign, via Abbott Mead Vickers SMS, will continue this year and new spots will be produced. Budweiser's 1986 ad budget is $9 million to $10 million.

Budweiser is served American-style in the U.K., i.e., four degrees colder than beer is usually served here. To keep the chill, special refrigeration units had to be installed in U.K. pubs and restaurants stocking Budweiser.

"While the consumer here likes cold beer, he doesn't like it very cold," said Courage's Mr. Stewart-Reed.

Meanwhile, Keith Holloway, commercial director of Watney Mann & Truman Brewers, the company that brews Budweiser in the U.K. under license from A-B, said he had been expecting the Miller launch.

"No one could convince me there is no connection between the success of Budweiser and the launch of Miller," he said. "We've been waiting for it."

Until now, light lagers have not been successful in Britain, and few remain on the market. Watney

. . .While A-B gets ready to bring Bud to Denmark

By VALERIE NAVARRO

COPENHAGEN—Now that its U.K. marketing plans are firmly in place, Anheuser-Busch is turning to Denmark, where the giant U.S. brewer is negotiating to produce and distribute Budweiser locally.

If the negotiations with Denmark's United Breweries are successful, sources have speculated that Denmark could be the springboard for a pan-European launch of Budweiser.

While neither A-B nor United would comment on the possibility of a pan-European rollout, beer industry sources say United, Denmark's leading brewer, is poised to help A-B launch Bud in other nations, both in terms of distribution and sales.This is because the brewery's two largest brands, Tuborg and Carlsberg, are available in virtually every European capital.

A-B and United are expected to complete negotiations for the licensed production and distribution of Budweiser in Denmark by the end of February, according to Jonathan Regicci, European marketing director for A-B.

Although Denmark's population is only about 5 million, the country ranks eighth in the world in per capita beer consumption with an average of 130 liters per person consumed annually.

However, Danish beer drinkers are notoriously loyal to local brands and industry observers expect A-B to encounter even more market-penetration problems here than in the U.K. Critics also point out that, to date, no imports have succeeded in Denmark.

In addition, beer is not sold in six-packs in Denmark. Instead, it is usually sold in 30-bottle cases. The bottles must be returned because of local laws that prohibit disposable bottles or aluminum cans.

Nonetheless, both A-B and United, which dominates the market with 80% of total beer sales, contend that the time appears right to introduce a well known American beer into the market with a strategy that echoes the plans of many European brands seeking success in America's marketplace.

There is a growing enchantment here with things American, much as there is a growing fascination with European products in the U.S., according to Mr. Regicci. He said this is especially true among the so-called "pace-setting" younger generation that could become the primary target group for Budweiser.

Mr. Regicci stressed that United, not A-B, would devise the Danish marketing strategy for Budweiser. Sources at both A-B and United said that because negotiations are under way, no advertising plans have been made and no agency has been assigned to handle Budweiser.

One of the primary agencies for United is Partners, which is affiliated with Ted Bates Advertising, New York, and handles Tuborg. The other is a local shop called Chinese workers peddle their bikes down a Shenyang street.

Bicycle market still growing in China

By LYNNE REAVES

BEIJING—A young clerk at a department store here adjusted the brakes of a new Phoenix brand bicycle and looked surprised when asked if one brand of Chinese bicycle is any different than another.

The question appeared reasonable to an American visitor staring at the 40 bicycles in the store. All were black, all were men's style bikes and all looked exactly alike. But, according to the Chinese, looks are deceiving.

"Of course, they are not the same," the clerk argued. "The Forever [brand] bicycle is much better for the city. It is lighter weight. The Flying Pigeon and the Phoenix are better for the countryside. You can haul more on them."

In China, riding a bike is not done for sport or recreation. It is a necessity. China moves on bicycles. Its 1 billion population rides bikes to work, uses them for hauling refrigerators and washing machines and even rents them out as taxis.

"When you buy a bicycle here, you aren't buying a bike—you're buying a tank," laughed a western magazine correspondent who recently bought a Chinese model. "The things weigh a ton. They are literally meant to last for 10 years."

Chinese bikes are made out of heavy steel, which is why few are exported. "We were working a possible bicycle deal a few years ago, and there also was talk Sears was going to import some Chinese bikes, but basically Americans require a lighter bike," said Neal Stender, manager here for Fuqua, a U.S. trading company. "There are problems with the alloy the Chinese use. For them to produce a lighter bike, at this point, would be a very complicated process."

But the lack of exports doesn't stop China from being the world's largest producer of bicycles.

In the first eight months of 1985 alone (the latest figure available) 21 million bikes were produced. That's a 14% increase from the same period in 1984.

Still, there are not enough to meet demand for the government-rationed bikes.

At the Xidan department store, there are two white stickers on each bike. One indicates the price while the other is the number of the special coupon a consumer must have to buy the bike. Coupons are issued by a "work unit" and must be obtained in order to purchase the bike.

Because this is a seller's market and because this is Communist China, there is little need for marketing and advertising.

But the Chinese do have strong preferences about the brand of bike they buy. Three brands are considered status symbols, the Rolls-Royces of China bikes. They are the Phoenix, the Forever and the Flying Pigeon.

The prices for the three brands are about the same, 90 2. That is about two month's salary to the average Chinese worker.

The country's current economic surge also has spurred a growing number of alternate brands, like the Flying Fish, Golden Lion, Five Rams and Red Flag.

Very recently, new styles have come on the market, including children's bikes, and "mini" bikes (bikes with small wheels). And as Chinese women are starting to shed their traditional Mao pants for Western skirts, women's bicycles are regaining popularity.

Some of the new bicycle companies use limited advertising to try to catch up with the "Big Three."

An ad recently appearing in a Beijing newspaper promoting the new Shanghai Red Flower children's bicycle claimed: "The aim of this factory is quality and customers first. We are facing the children and going into the world."

While price usually is no problem for the foreigner shopping for a bicycle in Beijing, there are other complications.

"You cannot buy this bicycle," said the department store clerk. "You are a foreigner. We can't sell bicycles to foreigners. There are not enough to go around. Foreigners must go to the Friendship Store to buy bicycles."

Beijing's Friendship Store is in a four-story building that caters to the hard currency of the city's foreign community and tourists.

At the Friendship Store last month there were five bicycles on the "display" floor. All were broken—missing brakes, wheel spokes and handle bars.

"Come back next month," said the female saleesclerk. "Perhaps we will have some then."

This data has been provided by Media Records for exclusive publication in Advertising Age and may not be reprinted or published in any form without explicit permission from Media Records. All newspapers represented are subscribers to Media Records. For those newspapers that subscribe to Media Records National Advertising Reporting Service, Total Advertising data shown has been supplied by the publisher to Media Records and included in this compilation. All publisher supplied figures are converted to MRCS SAU inches by Media Records. These newspapers are indicated with an asterisk (*).

REPORTING METHODOLOGY

Media Records continues to measure in image but due to the introduction of the SAU 6 column format Media Records has designed and developed a methodology with the approval of our subscribers, the INAME Measurements Committee, The ANPA/NAB Working Committee, The AAAA Newspaper Committee, and other industry groups.

The approved methodology is titled The Media Records Conversion System (MRCS) and is based upon the printed page area of each product of the newspaper and is a five step approach as follows:

1. Measure Printed Page
   Width and Depth in Inches.
2. Determine Square Inches of Page
   Multiply Width by Depth Inches.
3. Determine the Number of SAU Inches of Page
   Divide the Square Inches by 2.0625 (SAU Inches).
4. Measure the Total Lines of the Page
   Multiply Column Depth Agate Lines by the Number of Columns on the Page.
5. Determine the Factor for Converting Measured Lines to Reported SAU Inches

a large food marketer.

Here is a look at some of the marketplace ramifications, real and potential, of AIDS, the disease first identified in the U.S. in 1981 and now considered by many to be the country's most serious public health threat.

• Rubber gloves. "AIDS has reawakened the need to use proper aseptic tools," said Parker Lee, vp-medical products division of Ansell Inc., a Dothan, Ala., manufacturer of latex gloves whose sales were up 25% last year.

Industry followers say total sales grew by 7% to 8% last year, or double the pre-AIDS rate, to about 2 billion pairs of gloves. The biggest surge took place in the last six months.

The fastest-growing segment is in the dental profession: Many dentists have begun to wear rubber gloves for their own protection and peace of mind as well as that of their patients. Ansell's Mr. Lee predicts that sales to dentists could double within the next year to nearly 200 million pairs.

Ansell advertises its gloves in medical publications, via Medford Advertising, Atlanta, but hasn't made any AIDS claims in its advertising. "We don't have to say that," Mr. Lee said. "That part is understood."

• Food. Mr. Lee said "foodservice companies" are beginning to order rubber gloves, but this could not be confirmed by the companies—suppliers of food products to restaurants and other mass feeders.

It is difficult to confirm because food companies are reluctant to acknowledge publicly that they have considered the impact an irrational fear of AIDS might have on their business. Their worry is that talking about it might only heighten the fears.

Ms. Popcorn, BrainReserve president, said, "There has to be a trust bond. . .that the food is packaged in a sanitary way and that the people working with the food are sanitary." She suggests a subtle, homey approach. "It's almost like companies should give a super 'Good Housekeeping seal of approval' to their products."

"I think there is some credence" to her theory, says a food marketing executive, who asked that neither he nor his company be identified.

• Disinfectants. Many disinfectants kill AIDS and other viruses in the environment. But Alcide Corp., Norwalk, Conn., believes its new disinfectant, called Alcide, has an edge over competing products.

It so far is the only nontoxic solution successfully tested against the AIDS virus by the National Cancer Institute. The tests were conducted in November when the institute was searching for a general disinfectant to clean up areas where it conducts its own laboratory research on AIDS.

Its proven nontoxicity may render Alcide suitable for therapeutic use. It is being tested for the disinfection of blood at the Boston University School of Medicine, said Elliott Siff, Alcide vice-chairman-ceo.

Alcide is expected to seek Environmental Protection Agency approval to state its anti-AIDS properties on its label. Alcide already is registered with the EPA as a disinfectant, but it needs additional approval for its AIDS claims. So far, the EPA hasn't approved any disinfectants as AIDS virus killers.

Alcide, which went on the market in September, is sold now as a disinfectant for medical environments. That will change, however, if Alcide Corp., primarily a research and development company, can find a partner to market the product to consumers.

Now Alcide does limited institutional trade ads via Joseph M. Ferrazzo Inc., Shrub Oak, N.Y. But if the company can find a partner, it will advertise to the public that its solution kills the AIDS virus, Mr. Siff said.

• Condoms. Condom sales are increasing by about 10% annually now because of AIDS and other sex-related diseases, such as herpes. Growth rates were significantly lower than that in the 1960s and 1970s, when the birth-control pill became popular.

So far, none of the major marketers in the $100 million industry has specifically mentioned AIDS in advertising. There has been, however, increased reference to "sexually transmitted diseases," which apparently has become the accepted advertising euphemism for AIDS and herpes. In pre-AIDS times, ads spoke of "venereal disease."

Carter-Wallace, New York, which became market leader by virtue of its purchase last fall of Trojan maker Youngs Products, began referring specifically to "sexually transmitted diseases" in its print ads in 1984.

Condom sales have benefited from media reports on AIDS and its prevention, including a report in December by researchers at the University of California that showed condoms can prevent AIDS.

Condom sales to women also have increased significantly, in part because of fear of AIDS. In its January issue, Glamour reported on a survey indicating that nearly 70% of 800 women interviewed said they worried about "sexually transmitted diseases."

American Druggist, a New York-based trade publication, estimates that five years ago "fewer than 10% of condoms" were purchased by women. Today, it estimates that 25% to 30% of all condoms are purchased by women.

Condom print advertising already has spread from the men's magazines, where it used to appear almost exclusively.

Trojans current ads, for example, are running in Health, Redbook and Working Mother, as well as in Penthouse.

Carter-Wallace is conducting an "in-depth analysis" of its Trojan marketing, a company official says. The company also recently hired Ted Bates Advertising/New York

Ayds will stay Ayds

By VALERIE MACKIE

Ayds will be called Ayds regardless of AIDS.

The company that markets Ayds diet supplement, a candy-like cube that is popular before the bathing-suit season, is not going to change the name of the product despite its possible association with Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome.

"Consumers are smart enough to tell the difference between a disease and a diet product," said Frank DiPrima, exec vp and chief operating officer of Jeffrey Martin Inc., the Union, N.J.-based company that markets Ayds.

"The product has been around for 45 years. Let the disease change its name," he said.

Initial spending on a new campaign, introduced in January, will be more than $5 million through D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York.

The commercials, running primarily on daytime network tv with radio support, "stress the assistance Ayds will give in bolstering a dieter's willpower while satisfying the desire for goodies," Mr. DiPrima said.

The commercials will feature the tag line: "A lot of willpower in every little piece."#

AIDS misinformation rife

CHICAGO—A new survey done for ADVERTISING AGE shows much of the public believes, incorrectly, that Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome can be "caught" like a common cold.

"The potential for mass consumer boycotts triggered by a rumor or incident involving AIDS will be with us as long as tens of millions of Americans continue to think the disease can be spread by casual contact," says a report from Leo J. Shapiro & Associates, a consumer-research company.

Two national surveys of 300 people each found 23% of respondents believe they can get AIDS from "being near or touching" someone who has it, and 38% believe it can be contracted from touching things an AIDS carrier has touched. About 42% said they could get AIDS from touching dishes, towels and pillowcases at restaurants and hotels.

Percentages in the study may vary by 5 percentage points.

Only about one person in six (17%) reported taking any specific precautions, and these vary widely, from avoiding tableware that seems suspect in restaurants to "not having sex with anyone but mate."

The study concludes there is a lot of "free-floating anxiety" in the population about AIDS.#

contributions and sales promotions. As much as $50 million could be diverted to regional marketing programs this year. Chevrolet already has committed $25 million to 1986 special-project spending: $6 million in Texas, $4 million in the Northeast corridor, $2 million in Florida and $13 million in the three Pacific Coast states.

C-E last week formed a regional marketing group headed by senior vp-management supervisor Anthony Hopp, who previously was in charge of Chevy truck advertising and merchandising. Mr. Hopp's position parallels the one held within Chevrolet by former California marketing director Edward Roggenkamp III, who in November was named to the new post of marketing manager-field.

Under Mr. Roggenkamp are area marketing managers John Burrow, based in Santa Monica, Cal.; Robert Cenedella in Atlanta; Willard Gerard in Purchase, N.Y., and Colin Stewart Jr. in Detroit. Those regional managers have the authority to determine which products will be emphasized in a particular market and then develop marketing and advertising strategies.

C-E is expected to name area group directors who will parallel and work with the Chevy area marketing managers. Insiders expect account managers and possibly media buyers to be relocated to offices within the regions, though creative staff is likely to remain in Warren.

The agency missed out on one $10 million parcel of the account when Chevy chose Vic Olesen & Partners, Los Angeles, for its California marketing program (AA, Sept. 17, '84). Olesen's account since has expanded to Oregon and Washington with a $13 million budget.

The restructuring within C-E is an attempt to be more responsive to regional needs and reduce the chances of losing more chunks of the account to specialist retail shops.

In addition to advertising, Chevy area managers are responsible for promotions, merchandising, direct mail and public relations in their regions.

For example, Chevy's east area marketing team is sponsoring the Feb. 20 "Drive-Aid" rock concert at New York's Radio City Music Hall to benefit Live Aid's African famine-relief efforts (AA, Dec. 19). Chevy, via C-E, also is supporting an eight-city sweepstakes for an IROC Z28 Camaro autographed by performers at last July's Live Aid concert.#

Chevy spends big in Texas

By RAYMOND SERAFIN

HOUSTON—The marketing eyes of Chevrolet are upon Texas, where a $6 million effort represents one early test of the General Motors division's new regionalized strategy.

"Chevy is making a long-term commitment to bring marketing decisions closer to the market," said Robert Cenedella, Chevrolet area marketing manager-South, who met last week with area dealers here to explain the program that will break Feb. 24.

The Texas marketing project made its debut in Dallas-Fort Worth in December.

Texas differs even from the other states in Mr. Cenedella's 12-state region of 80 million residents.

For starters, about 40% of the 1 million vehicles of all makes bought last year in Texas were trucks, compared with a national average of 30%, and a proportion of only 25% in Florida.

Also, Chevy's truck group outsells the division's car line in Texas by about 3 to 2, a reverse of national averages.

Media spending in the Texas project is being weighted 60/40 in favor of trucks to reflect that reality.

New tv creative, via Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., for Chevy truck shows Texans in favorite fishing spots. "Chevy's got just the truck for you to bring home the catch," the voiceover says.

Voiceover on national tv spots has been adapted to the state market.

The musical "Lean on me" spot, for instance, now says that "Over the years, more Texans have leaned on Chevy trucks than any other make."

Car spots have undergone similar retracking and reediting, with emphasis at first on the Camaro, Cavalier and Celebrity lines.

Tag lines have been adapted. "Nothing works like a Chevy truck" is preceded by "Hey Texas!" in all truck spots, while the car closing logo, "Today's Chevrolet," is followed by the tag "for today's Texans."

Network tv feeds will be changed to showcase the products Chevy wants to emphasize in Texas.

Spot tv will be the primary medium, but new creative will be used for spot radio and outdoor. Radio commercials take a humorous approach, such as in a series of spots described by Bill Ludwig, senior vp-creative director for the project, as "truck styles of the rich and famous."

Mr. Cenedella said the decentralized marketing makes Chevy more flexible in responding to local promotions, such as historical activities this year marking Texas' sesquicentennial.

Chevy also will put more emphasis on focus groups and other market research, he said.#

Gen. Mills

nuts. The 12½-oz. boxes will sell for around $2.30.

General Mills would not comment on the product, but Campbell-Mithun, Minneapolis, is believed to handle the account. Its other major cereal agency, Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York, was assigned Raisin Nut Bran (targeted to adults).

Both new products add to the rivalry between No. 2 General Mills and Kellogg Co., Battle Creek, Mich., which analysts say now holds a 43.1% share of the $4.3 billion ready-to-eat cereal market.

General Mills, with 22%, is the only other cereal marketer whose efforts analysts credit with having any substantial effect on Kellogg's share, which recently has shown signs of slippage (AA, Jan. 27).

Until last year, General Mills' tendency had been to introduce only one new cereal a year. In 1985, however, the company added three brands—Bran Muffin Crisp, Fiber One and S'Mores Crunch—to its cereal lineup.

Heavy network tv, radio and couponing for Rocky Road begins March 31, retail grocery buyers reported.

General Mills is promising 42 weeks of tv spots during children's time slots, running in four-week flights for a total of 300 gross ratings points.

Prime time tv advertising, also pledged to run for 42 weeks, breaks March 31, too. Those spots will run in three-week flights for a total of 875 grps. An additional five weeks of spots breaking April 6 will be concentrated during "family" viewing hours for an average of 50 grps each week, retail sources said.

Radio spots aimed at teen agers will start April 6, followed by a 35¢-off coupon dropped via newspaper freestanding insert April 13. A 25¢-off fsi coupon is planned for June 8 and a 30¢-off coupon is planned for Sept. 7.#

to handle consumer advertising "to strengthen the brand," a spokeswoman said. (Poppe Tyson, New York, continues to handle trade advertising.)

Condom marketers still are limited primarily to print advertising, but other barriers are breaking down, thanks in part to the AIDS epidemic, industry officials say.

One example they cite is Warner-Lambert's cable tv ads, via J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, for its Lifestyles brand condoms (using Dr. Ruth Westheimer).

Some condom marketers suggest they may try to use the AIDS issue as a lever to break the long-standing taboo against tv broadcasts of condom commercials.

Tv executives do not see condom advertising in the future. "We feel contraceptives are controversial and a significant amount of our audience finds it offensive on moral and religious grounds," said George Schweitzer, vp-communications, CBS Broadcast Group.

• Other ventures. A Los Angeles company that calls itself the National Assn. for AIDS Awareness wants to open a 7,000-sq.-ft. clinic that would test individuals for AIDS and advertise the service.

The service, which already does leafletting and pr, would issue an identification card saying the bearer had not been exposed to the virus if the tests are negative.

The Los Angeles city government so far has refused to issue a medical building permit for the center, citing zoning ordinances.

Elsewhere, other companies have placed ads for "viral sprays" that allegedly protect against AIDS. "There are companies making these claims and when you try to find them, they're out of business," said an EPA spokesman.#

Making it small

"Everything we do is important because we don't do a lot of it," says Tony Angotti, co-creative director of Angotti Thomas Hedge. "If we do a clunker it could be really devastating." An emphasis on value and clients with luxury products is what ATH is all about. With just four employes, the three principals are trying to make it in a land bottle-fed on "Big is beautiful." Giving them the audacity to think they can is their unshakable belief that a gap exists between upmarket advertisers and creative talent that understands these markets. See Page 4.

MCI agencies pitch

WASHINGTON—MCI Communications Corp. is reviewing speculative creative work from incumbent agencies Ally & Gargano and D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles in preparation for a planned consolidation of its $40 million long-distance ad business. A&G handles MCI's consumer ad account, which bills about 85% of the total. DMB&B handles the carrier's business-to-business advertising. MCI plans to shift the bulk of its spending to business customers next fall. Both New York agencies recently made presentations that included both consumer and business advertising, an MCI source said. A&G earlier made an unsuccessful bid to wrest the business-to-business account from B&B (AA, Nov. 26, '84).

Datago says no

VALHALLA, N.Y.—Nynex Corp.'s Datago 14-store computer retail chain has shelved all plans for corporate ads, via Angotti Thomas Hedge. The New York shop became Datago's agency of record last March. Rye-based Peter Plik & Associates continues handling Datago's retail ads.

Smokeless ad ban nears

WASHINGTON—Tv and radio advertising for smokeless tobacco seems to be heading for the history books after this week's House approval of legislation that bans such ads and mandates health warnings on print ads and packaging. Senate approval—which one aide called a "fait accompli"—was pending at press time (AA, Feb. 1).

Troubled waters

MIAMI—Costa Cruise Lines has quit the Cruise Lines International Assn., New York, in opposition to CLIA's proposed $1 million generic ad campaign scheduled to break March 1 (AA, Jan. 20). Princess, Royal Caribbean and Royal Cruise Lines also have pulled out of CLIA in protest. Doyle Dane Bernbach, New York, handles.

ST. LOUIS—Anheuser-Busch further has increased its nonbeer business by acquiring Sante Mineral Waters, Santa Rosa, Cal., three months after purchasing Saratoga Springs Co. (AA, Nov. 11). Other than your own clients', what were the most creative and effective commercials during the Super Bowl? Last week, Chicago and Boston had their say; here are picks from elsewhere in the country.

Ross Van Dusen, senior vp-creative director, Chiat/Day, San Francisco: "The best work I saw in it, the campaign that strikes me as nifty, was the John Hancock spot. It was fresh tv, powerful advertising. That work was outstanding. I can't think of anything else. Everything else had the feeling of 'this is advertising.' The [Timex] watch commercial struck me as trying to be '1984' [Apple Computer's '1984' Super Bowl spot], but it didn't impress me that way; it didn't knock me out."

R. VAN DUSEN

S. SEGAL

Stephen Segal, senior vp-media director, Lowe Marschalk Inc., New York: "I liked the series of new McDonald's 'McD.L.T.' executions. What I liked most was the scheduling of one per quarter leading up to the final one congratulating the Bears immediately after the game ended. The series in total seemed to make McDonald's stand out as the sponsor of the game. It was probably the best way of using the Super Bowl as an advertising vehicle with the exception of Adidas, which got even more exposure at a lot lower cost."

Chuck Silverman, managing partner-creative director, Scali, McCabe, Sloves, Los Angeles: "Like most humane football fans, I tuned out after the first half. It was Timex and John Hancock running neck and neck, a distant third behind Chiat/Day's '1984' and 'Lemmings' spots for Apple. Those commercials made the Super Bowl the Super Bowl of Advertising at over a million bucks a minute. Over-all, I don't think the Super Bowl advertisers got their money's worth out of their creative."

C. SILVERMAN

Steve Kopcha, exec vp-executive creative director, D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Bloomfield Hills, Mich.: "Nobody broke new dramatic ground on the Super Bowl, but Sears and Gillette [Right Guard] scored with well produced commercials with good selling points in them. There was no '1984' in 1986."

Cliff Einstein, chairman-creative director, Dailey & Associates, Los Angeles: "McD.L.T. They took a very mundane subject —lettuce and tomato hamburgers, hot and cold--and found a way of expressing the idiosyncracies of that product. I thought it was fascinating and memorable. It was a series, and it stood out."

Sales Promotion

Jostling for consumers', marketers' attention

By Len Strazewski

There's barely room to walk down the street. Sales promotion is everywhere: Popping out of displays, jumping from the hands of product samplers and fighting for consumer attention along with traditional advertising and direct response campaigns.

Yet sales promotion is almost as mysterious as it is pervasive, a marketing industry stepchild aggressively seeking recognition.

For years, many marketers considered sales promotion to be on the fringes of the mainstream, populated more by premium sellers working out of their automobiles than account execs working out of skyscrapers.

In 1986, however, sales promotion seems to be taking its place among other marketing disciplines in large multimedia marketing programs. Like pr agencies and direct marketing companies in previous years, sales promotion agencies are becoming hot targets for acquisition by general advertising agencies.

New York-based Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, for example, acquired the Howard Marlboro Group, New York, on June 24, 1985, and Burson-Marsteller, New York, acquired Rogers Merchandising, Downers Grove, Ill., on Nov. 1, 1984. Several general agencies, including Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, and BBDO, New York, have developed their own sales promotion subsidiaries.

But despite protests to the contrary from executives of the leading sales promotion agencies, some of the old stigmas and mysteries remain.

Sales promotion covers a variety of marketing techniques, ranging from sophisticated computer-driven sampling and testing programs to actors in chicken suits handing out coupons for fast food.

Privately held sales promotion agencies are reluctant to document their annual billings for comparison with their competitors, hindering accurate estimates of the size of the sales promotion business.

"We've all used estimates of $60 billion to $65 billion in speeches or the like, but we don't really know," says William Robinson, president of William A. Robinson Inc., Chicago. "And there's no real way to find out."

Robinson has about 50 employes in three offices, including New York and Los Angeles, and claims 1985 revenues between $5 million and $10 million, Mr. Robinson says.

"So many aspects of the sales promotion business are so different that no one really tracks the field in the way advertising billings are tracked, and agencies perform so many different functions, from pure consulting to printing and manufacturing, that trying to compare their revenues is like comparing apples and oranges."

Other industry sources estimate the size of the business as large as $85 billion, but just how much is spent on pure promotional development and how much is generated by ancillary media and direct marketing or printing and manufacturing of premiums is unknown.

Industry experts, however, do track the relative flow of dollars within the sales promotion industry.

Donnelley Marketing, a Stamford, Conn.-based couponing, sampling and saturation mailing company, annually surveys the industry on spending in various sales promotion techniques: Trade incentives, direct consumer couponing, premium offers, refund offers, sweepstakes, cents-off promotions, new product sampling, prepriced shipments, retailer coupons, established product sampling and other contests.

In Donnelley's seventh annual survey of promotional practices in 1984, the company reported that trade promotion spending still dominated promotional practices, but consumer promotions continued to grow in relation to total spending.

In 1984, 42% of all promotional dollars were spent on consumer promotions, up from 40% in 1983 and 36% in 1982.

Donnelley's report on 1985 promotional practices is not complete, according to director of media services Dick Vincent, but early analysis of 1985 data suggests consumer promotion is continuing to grow at trade incentives' expense.

"The early returns indicate two trends," Mr. Vincent says. "The share of promotion dollars spent on consumer promotions is still growing. However, our data indicates that the over-all amounts spent on promotion in 1985 is about the same; so it is pretty clear that the share of dollars spent on trade promotion must be shrinking."

Trade promotions, the manufacturers' or packagers' use of special volume pricing or discounts for retailers to persuade them to expand shelf space for products or offer sales to consumers are a thorny problem for sales promoters. Many promotion experts believe that strong trade promotion builds volume at the expense of profit margin and encourages consumers to buy on price rather than brand loyalty.

Trade promotions also tend to be too defensive, promoters say, designed to protect against the encroachment of new brands into retailers' shelves, but leading to head-to-head price competition among brands. A series of stories in this section examines these issues.

Consumer promotions, however, take their appeals directly to consumers and can involve coupons, free samples or trials, rebates or premiums.

Donnelley's study of 1984 promotion practices reveals that direct distribution of coupons to consumers was the most popular consumer promotion, used by 95% of responding marketing executives, slightly more than had used it the previous year.

About 82% said they used premium offers (about the same amount as in 1983), and 81% said they used refunds or rebates (slightly less than the previous year). Seventy-three per cent said they used sweepstakes promotions (down from 78% the previous year).

Industry sources say they expect these trends to continue, reflecting a move to more aggressive consumer promotions and greater use of direct mail to deliver coupons and other consumer offers.

"Consumer promotions are taking a strong tactical position these days," says Joseph Flanagan, president of Chicago-based Impact, the sales promotion subsidiary of Foote, Cone & Belding. "This is in contrast with trade promotions, which have always been rather defensive."

Impact, one of the largest sales promotion shops owned by a general advertising agency, has about 70 employes in Chicago, New York and San Francisco, and generated about $5.5 million in revenue in 1985. Industry consensus puts it solidly in the nation's top 10 sales promotion agencies.

"As recently as a couple of years ago, our industry was known more for developing one-shot, short-term promotions and special events," Mr. Flanagan says.

"Now sales promotion is looking for the long-term, fitting into broad marketing plans. There is a better environment now than ever for balanced marketing approaches combining advertising, public relations and sales promotion."

Different types of clients are trying sales promotion tactics, says Mr. Flanagan, who becomes president of the Council of Sales Promotion Agencies in June. The CSPA is a 32-member trade group representing sales promotion agencies that specialize in promotion consulting rather than premium or display manufacturing.

Member agencies, Mr. Flanagan says, report that high-technology marketers are becoming more aware of sales promotion. Such giants as International Business Machines and Zenith Data Systems

Early enrollment strives for high scores in brand loyalty

An audience is ripe for sales promotion as soon as it can read, says Steven M. Kaplan, marketing director for Sampling Corp. of America, Glenview, Ill.

Sampling manages sales promotions and product sampling programs in elementary schools for a variety of national clients, including Crest toothpaste, Kool-Aid, Citrus Hill orange juice, Duncan Hines, Jif peanut butter, Keebler cookies and several cereal companies.

"What we have discovered is that children are buyers, if not immediately, then eventually," Mr. Kaplan says. "People tend to buy what they are used to and the best time to build brand identification and brand loyalty is when consumers are young and developing their use habits."

School promotions also reach parents, Mr. Kaplan says, when students bring home promotional messages, coupons and samples. Couponing and sampling in schools is not unusual. School principals can get 10 to 15 calls a week from marketers, he says.

Product sampling and couponing is a standard technique used by most of the major sales promotion agencies, though most agencies target adult consumers with insert advertising or saturation mail delivery of samples and coupons. What separates Sampling from its competitors is its commitment to school-oriented promotion and its practice of linking promotions to holidays and social concerns such as safety, health and fitness.

Sampling tries to enhance its programs with a message—usually about safety.

"We never just give samples," says Mr. Kaplan. "Schools don't have to accept samples blindly and probably shouldn't."

The company's longest running promotion, begun four years ago for Crest toothpaste, focuses on Halloween safety and features a bright orange "Trick or Treat" bag decorated with sponsor logos, an orange reflector patch for Halloween costumes, safety posters for school and a flier of safety tips for parents.

As the regionalized programs expanded to include other clients, including General Mills cereals, several juice companies and Keebler cookies, the treat bag came filled with samples and coupons. The samples also became the nucleus for school parties, Mr. Kaplan says.

"Participating in the Halloween event and meeting safety needs gave the coupons lots of extra impact. The average coupon redemption from the 'Super Safety Trick or Treat' promotion was over 18%," he says, compared with less than 10% redemption rate for direct mail and 5% for newspapers and inserts.

In 1985, the Halloween promotion reached more than 9 million children in some 20,000 schools across the nation. Recent research from the Chicago office of Burke Marketing Services indicates the promotion creates about 20 million impressions for every 1 million children contacted.

"Part of the visibility of the promotion has to do with our commitment to issues such as safety," Mr. Kaplan says. "Local television stations have made holiday child safety a regular feature, and publicity kits on our promotions provide material. Last year, our Halloween bag and reflectors made the 6 p.m. news in a dozen cities around the country."

Kool-Aid Man quenches the thirsties and satisfies Sampling's criterion for a social message.

Sampling parlayed the success of the Halloween promotion into similar holiday and seasonal promotions for single clients and client groups.

A Thanksgiving promotion with posters, stickers and a do-it-yourself centerpiece featured Citrus Hill orange juice logos and coupons, and Kool-Aid sponsored a summer safety promotion featuring a safety tips poster and a comic book produced by Marvel Comics Group, New York, on the adventures of "Kool-Aid Man."

For Valentine's Day, the company produced a multiclient Valentine kit, which included samples of Crush soft drinks, Jif peanut butter and coupons, as well as Duncan Hines brownie and cookie mixes.

"Teachers received the mix samples in advance so they could bake cookies and brownies for the school parties and the children could report to their parents on how good they tasted. The kit also came in a decorated box that could be used as a drop for Valentine cards," Mr. Kaplan says.

Participating in the national multiclient promotions cost clients about 7 cents per student, Mr. Kaplan says, and a single client promotion costs about 15 to 16 cents per student.

"The return comes about in more than immediate sales. We've seen product sales increase as much as 100% in some markets, but we think the real advantage in promoting to children in schools is in the product loyalty we are building," Mr. Kaplan says. "These kids will be buying products for a long time." —L.S.

Trade price discounts holding hostages

By Richard Edel

Trade promotion fever has package goods manufacturers trapped in a prisoner's dilemma. They hate the system but can't escape without taking some big risks.

Staying with traditional price promotions means an increasing spiral of discounts, dragging consumers away from brand loyalty and toward the lowest prices.

The solution is to get back to the original concept of trade promotion—payment for performance, says Robert Brown, president of SPAR, a Tarrytown, N.Y.-based consultant. "Manufacturers and retailers recognize they're in a bad situation. They need to get some discipline," he says.

A continuing study by Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago, confirms this dismal quandary. The percentage of consumers saying they try to stick with major brands fell from about 80% in 1975 to about 60% in 1985. At the same time, consumers say their use of coupons is up substantially, according to the study.

"We are training consumers to buy more on price than brand," says Graham Phillips, U.S. chairman of Ogilvy & Mather, New York.

The reason seems to be the traditional price-oriented trade promotion, the per case discounts manufacturers offer retailers to push products by allocating more shelf space and floor display area.

Brand advertising once was heavily favored over trade promotion, but for many product categories, including soft drinks, soap and health and beauty aids, the opposite is now true, retailers and advertising executives say (see related stories).

Mr. Phillips points to grocery scanners and the long-standing trend toward retail consolidation as the major forces at work. Greater buying leverage for major chains coupled with fast updates of sales data from scanners reinforces an upward spiral of trade promotions. Scanners show that brand share can fluctuate from 4% to 55% because of various forms of promotion incentives, he says.

"What worries an advertising man today is the fact that price and coupon promotion have such an enormous impact on short-term sales. The scanner is akin to Eve with a basket full of red apples tempting manufacturers to forgo the world of branded marketing," he says.

Unless a balance is struck between short and long-term goals, brand marketing for some products will continue to erode, he says. "There is no gain for anybody if that happens," Mr. Phillips says.

Retailers have been the biggest winners so far. Scanner information, among other factors, is shifting the balance of power in the package goods market to retailers from manufacturers, experts say. With the shift in power, some branded marketing efforts are crumbling as their makers focus on price promotion instead of building demand.

Several other key factors contribute to this effect, says Michael F. Carey, vp, Glendinning Associates, a Westport, Conn., consulting company. Slow revenue and unit growth for mature categories, such as paper products, soaps, detergents and beverages, is forcing manufacturers into greater dependence on price promotion as a means of selling more volume by gaining it from competitors.

Also, a low inflation rate makes it difficult for brand managers to increase profits year after year through price increases. The solution is to take a shortcut by temporarily buying volume with price cuts and other incentives to retailers, such as rollbacks, rebates and advertising allowances.

While such shortcuts work well in the short term, overuse can spell disaster for brand profitability in the long term, even while the product may appear to be gaining market share and sales volume, Mr. Carey says.

"In effect, some manufacturers are mortgaging their futures," he says. "Every dollar spent on trade promotions takes one dollar away from the advertising and marketing necessary to build a strong consumer franchise."

> There were 15,379 items in a supermarket in 1984 versus 9,000 in 1974.
> Food Marketing Institute

Like an addiction, the more a brand relies on deals to move product, the more it is forced into more frequent deals to keep moving forward, Mr. Carey says.

How this situation plays out will depend to a large degree on how retailers interpret the data collected by grocery scanners.

Scanning technology permits them to gather and store tremendous amounts of data about brand share and product movement on a daily basis. In turn, retailers make decisions on how to display and advertise products to boost sales and profits.

The pressure is magnified by the low profit margin in the grocery industry, where net profit averages about 1 cent on $1 in sales, says Michael Rourke, vp for marketing and corporate affairs at the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., Montvale, N.J.

"There isn't much room for error," Mr. Rourke says.

Because trade allowances can add anywhere from 1% to 3% to a retailer's bottom line, they are extremely important in over-all profitability, he says.

For example, a chain like A&P, which has 1,100 stores and annual sales approaching $7 billion for 1985, could add $70 million to $210 million from trade promotions during a year.

"Trade allowances sometimes can be considered part of the basic buying apparatus. Some retailers say, 'Don't talk to me unless it's on deal,' " Mr. Rourke says. With so much at stake, the feeling is, " 'You'd better give us everything you're giving everybody else.' "

Another factor is intense competition for shelf space. There were 15,379 items in a typical supermarket in 1984 versus 9,000 in 1974, according to the Food Marketing Institute.

With so many items vying for attention, retailers could be swamped by an unorganized approach to sales promotion. So they are taking the initiative and offering promotional programs based on their own marketing objectives.

Super Valu Stores, Minneapolis, for example, has promoted full lines of products from General Foods, Procter & Gamble and General Mills, among others. In exchange for more retailer attention, manufacturers contribute advertising allowances for space in roto inserts or weekly newspaper ads, additional funds for tv and radio spots, and give discounts for special pricing and positioning with point-of-sale displays.

Just getting the best possible deal from a manufacturer would allow the retailer to remain price competitive, but price is only one element in the over-all marketing strategy, he says.

"Price is a very strong motivator, but you can't base your entire strategy on price," Mr. Rourke says. "Most consumers are very interested in price, but it is not their primary motivator. Thay are looking for specials, variety, selection, service, atmosphere and speedy checkout."

A retailer's marketing strategy is the key to using trade allowances effectively, says Tom Morrison, corporate vp for advertising and sales promotion at Grand Union Corp., Elmwood Park, N.J.

Mr. Morrison, who has worked in sales management and promotion for both PepsiCo and Procter & Gamble, says the ability to target consumers and develop a strategic plan based on value, quality and price increasingly will determine the success of retailers.

The marketing strategy has to be based on information, however, which once again raises the issue of how retailers use scanner data. "Information, not data, is the key to power," he says.

To generate information, the retailer has to apply sophisticated computer programs to scanner databases and develop management techniques to measure the incremental profit and volume received from a host of sales promotions, he says.

Several consulting companies offer these services, including SPAR, which also tracks retail execution of promotions for manufacturers; Information Resources Inc., Chicago, and Dialogue Inc., New York.

Several companies also supply decision support systems, Metaphor, Mountain View, Cal.; A.C. Nielsen Co., Deerfield, Ill.; Market Science Associates, Pittsburgh. Management consultants include McKinsey & Co., New York, and Glendinning. Majers Corp., Omaha, Neb., collects data on retail advertising and sells scanner data.

Mr. Morrison uses three benchmarks in evaluating the effectiveness of sales promotion. First is direct product profitability, a financial measuring device that charges all costs in handling an item to the bottom line. For instance, the refrigeration costs of keeping frozen foods would be charged against that category when considering profitability.

The second benchmark is whether the item is a traffic builder, such as baked and frozen goods, that bring customers into the store. Retailers are willing to lose some profits on these items in exchange for building in-store traffic.

Finally, Mr. Morrison considers the effect of building market share by trading profits for volume. The idea is to select the promotion that offers the best value to the consumer, taking the targeted consumer's shopping habits into account.

For example, counter displays featuring discount candy bars could boost item sales to the point that the promotion results in a net profit increase, outweighing any reduction in profit margin.

But development of successful promotion strategies must take the manufacturer into account, Mr. Morrison says.

"It's a partnership through information," he says. "We want trade spending to be a win-win situation for the manufacturer and Grand Union. The message is that when you deal with us, you're getting bang for your buck. If we can't perform, I can't in good conscience take [a manufacturer's] money," he says.

"We've got all the data. So why not form a partnership where everybody wins."

Manufacturers create package of ads, incentives, promotions

By Richard Edel

Sometimes a trade promotion can seem to have it all—creative advertising, coupons, point-of-sale displays and big discounts—and it still flops.

That happens even though money spent on trade promotion continues to grow. Trade allowances for package goods to drug, grocery and discount stores has grown from about $9 billion in 1979 to $15 billion in 1984, according to Majers Corp., an Omaha, Neb.-based company that monitors trade promotions for manufacturers.

These dollars don't always reach their target—consumers.

New York-based consulting companies Booz Allen & Hamilton and McKinsey & Co. estimate that from one-third to two-thirds of all money spent on trade promotions is wasted. A 1976 study in Sloan Management Review, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Mass., estimates 33% of the money spent on trade promotion is passed on to the consumer.

Gillette adds value to promotions by timing cash and prize giveaways to coincide with sporting events, such as the World Series.

Reacting to improve retailer response to trade promotion, manufacturers are designing a unified package containing advertising message, consumer incentives and trade promotions.

At the same time, they are focusing on local and regional

Big, bold and dominant, SUPERCLOCK overcomes supermarket clutter by allowing you to literally put your product up in lights—on a brightly backlit display—seven feet wide by two feet high.

What's more, there is only one SUPERCLOCK per store. And it is always located in a prime, high-density traffic area, thereby guaranteeing your product repeated exposures to every shopper. That's important, for 65% of all purchase decisions are made on-the-spot, in the store.

Now available in 5,000 high volume supermarkets nationwide, SUPERCLOCK advertising can be purchased on a national, regional or local basis. Whichever one you choose, we think you'll find that SUPERCLOCK is the best buy in the store.

market conditions to gain greater retailer support.

"Part of the problem is that many companies simply are not translating their advertising message down to retail where the purchase decision is made," says John Kawula, exec vp of the Point-of-Purchase Advertising Institute, Fort Lee, N.J.

Such mistakes can have a big impact on the success of a promotion, he says.

For example, consumers purchasing impulse items such as snack foods are 250% more likely to buy an item located on an offshelf display. They are 380% more likely to buy an item they remember seeing in an ad. But they are nearly 600% more likely to buy an item they have seen advertised when that item is located on an offshelf display, according to a 1978 POPAI study sponsored by Du Pont, Wilmington, Del.

Manufacturers also can be naive about how retailers use promotional funds and materials, says Janice G. Cohen, director of marketing at SPAR Marketing Services, Tarrytown, N.Y. Sometimes manufacturers attempt to generate excitement for trade promotions by turning them into theme events or tying them into sporting games such as the Super Bowl, Olympics and World Series, she says.

One manufacturer ran a high-visibility, all-brands promotion timed to peak a week before Super Bowl XIX in 1985.

Based on SMS audits of 2,000 supermarkets over the three weeks leading up to the event, 64% of the stores failed to use offshelf displays for even one of the nine brands on promotion, despite the fact that all brands tended to be first or second in the category.

Sixteen per cent of the stores displayed one brand, 14% displayed two or three brands, and 6% displayed four or more. Only 22% of the stores had a display and point-of-purchase materials, even though seven specially designed types of point-of-purchase material were available. Of the stores with displays, only 17% had three or more pieces, SMS found.

The manufacturer did not calculate the incremental volume and profit a retailer could expect from the promotion, Ms. Cohen says, so the company had no way of selling the program's benefits to retailers or of determining the payback they would gain from giving the products extra push. Consequently, the promotion was virtually ignored, she says.

"The company can't expect better retailer support because it doesn't know whether it actually is in the retailer's self-interest," Ms. Cohen says.

Another stumbling block for trade promotions is making its various elements work as a whole, says David Coward, vp-marketing with the safety razor division of Gillette Co., Boston.

Gillette, which times many promotions to coincide with sporting events such as the World Series, Olympics and baseball's All-Star game, focuses on an over-all strategy, making its advertising and incentives work in concert. And you can't ignore the price tag, he says.

Creating package

"A lot of promotions fail because they're not agency packaged, they haven't got all the elements, and [the manufacturer] tries to do it on the cheap," Mr. Coward says. "Promotions are not cheap. Taking everything into account, the least expensive part is the prizes."

Gillette's promotions typically start with retail trade allowances on best-selling brands, adding sizzle in the form of a sweepstakes to attract consumer attention. Gillette's Super Bowl promotion offers a 1986 Ford Thunderbird and $25,000 cash as the grand prize, for example.

Next, free-standing newspaper inserts are used to encourage customer traffic in stores, Mr. Coward says. Store displays tie in the ad message and usually contain sweepstakes entry coupons, which also may include a rebate offer to stimulate in-store buying. The rebate offer or prize claim check is made redeemable at the store of purchase, which generates a second buying opportunity.

Gillette generates added excitement by offering prizes for a competition that relates to the event itself, such as picking the most valuable player in the World Series.

The benefit for Gillette in gaining additional retailer participation in its promotions has been significant short-term boosts in sales volume and market share, Mr. Coward says.

For retailers, the reward is incremental volume and profits, not extra cash on the bottom line in the form of discounts or rollbacks, he says. But to reap the benefits, they have to perform.

"A lot of promotions fail because the trade doesn't get behind them. If the store doesn't display, there is no payoff," Mr. Coward says.

Because retailers increasingly use scanner information to interpret the results of promotional strategies, they are more likely to participate in promotions designed by companies with good track records, says Michael Jeans, vp for marketing with the package foods division of Chesebrough-Pond's, Greenwich, Conn.

Manufacturers used to offer incentives such as free trips and merchandise as a means of gaining retailer cooperation, but the practice has tapered off considerably, he says.

"The trade is a lot more sophisticated today. A few years ago, some manufacturers used to get a lot of mileage out of trips. But now the trade is interested in a good economic proposition," Mr. Jeans says.

Chesebrough-Pond's, for example, now supplies on-line information about market share, factory orders and shipments by account to its regional managers. In the past, the company issued weekly reports.

"Our salespeople can know instantly what is happening in their regions. It's a big help when a sales representative sits across from a [retail] buyer

"BASICS"

Everything you've ever needed to know to run your business successfully.

Well, almost.

"Basics" is a new Ad Age monthly series aimed at presenting the rudiments of information about specialized areas of business operations. These "take-outs" are designed to make you an "expert" in areas that your previous experience or training may not have included, such as telemarketing, or computer options, or designing a small audio-video office facility.

"Basics" will appear the fourth Monday of each month. Each "Basics" will analyze a common business problem area, approaching it from scratch.

You may face these problem areas as the key person in a small agency, or as an AE or Media Planner in a giant one; as the only marketer in a small company or as product manager in a huge conglomerate. They're designed to start you at ground zero, and bring you up to speed quickly.

Among the topics to be covered in early "Basics" are:

Telemarketing	Business Travel
Sales Meetings	Computer Options
Sales Promotion	TV Production Costs

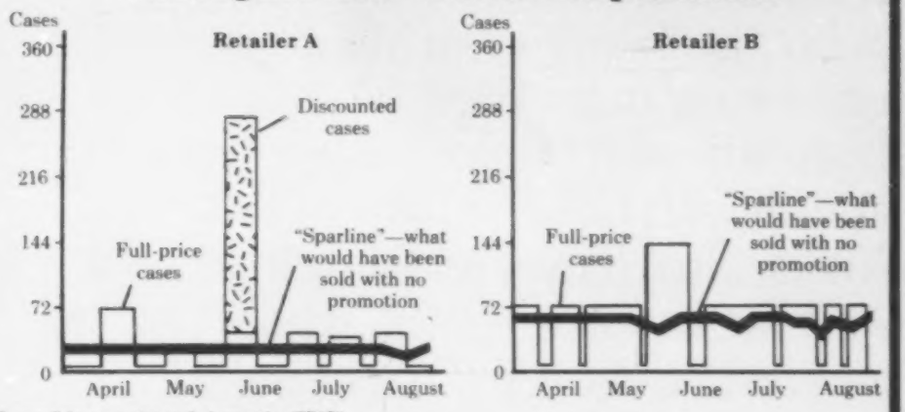
Winning in retail—a matter of promotion



Source: Sales promotion analysis reporting (SPAR)

Marketers calculate return on promotion

It is difficult to tell if retailers use trade promotion funds properly.

Sometimes competing retailers use a trade allowance to give price breaks to consumers. Sometimes retailers just pocket the money. To find out how retailers use trade promotion dollars, manufacturers need to follow up on their deals by examining retailers' inventory depletions and buying patterns, says Robert Brown, president of SPAR, Tarrytown, N.Y.

If necessary, manufacturers should redesign promotions, keeping in mind the idea of "pay for performance," he says.

Mr. Brown is a master of trade promotion analysis and inventor of the Sales Promotion and Analysis Reporting system, a method of measuring promotions for profitability developed 20 years ago for Hershey Foods Corp. The SPAR system now is used by Procter & Gamble, PepsiCo, Del Monte Corp., R.T. French Co. and Allen Products Co., among other package goods giants.

To illustrate the concept of pay for performance, Mr. Brown provided data gained over two years from audits of the New Orleans stores of Jacksonville, Fla.-based Winn-Dixie Stores and New Orleans-based Schwegmann Brothers Giant Supermarket stores during annual promotions on a condiment brand (see box).

In the first year, the manufacturer offered a straight discount —25% off invoice—which both retailers accepted. Analysis of followup buying indicates one chain used the discount to replace normal product turn business at a lower price. The other used it for forward buying, equipped with scanner data," Mr. Jeans says.

Chesebrough-Pond's also attempts to generate excitement by tying promotions into theme events. For example, Ragu brand sponsors an Italian Festival each fall that gives retailers an opportunity to group promotions on olives, spaghetti noodles, olive oil, meats and vegetables, he says.

"We try to approach the chains with a powerful idea from a leading brand in its category backed by a good level of trade support," Mr. Jeans says.

Chesebrough-Pond's also gathers and interprets data about incremental sales and profits from trade promotion to guide strategic thinking, he says.

stocking up on a two-months' supply of the condiment.

Neither store generated incremental volume or profits from the promotion.

In the second year, the manufacturer changed promotion strategy, offering a 28% discount per case only for retailers offering the product with specific monitored retail performance.

> While retailers have tremendous amounts of data, many lack the money, desire, manpower or commitment to analyze it.

Retailer A participated, selling nearly 300 extra cases of product during the four-week promotion, generating increased profits of about $800.

Retailer B ignored the promotion, losing incremental volume of 480 cases and incremental profit of $1,234, SPAR calculates.

The example shows that while retailers have tremendous amounts of data, many lack the money, desire, manpower or commitment to analyze it, Mr. Brown says. But manufacturers have the ability to analyze promotions across a range of products and generate good programs based on what will generate incremental sales and profits for themselves and retailers, he says.

"The results are extremely effective because they allow and force both partners in the channel of distribution to focus on selling product and not trying to gain at the expense of one another," Mr. Brown says.

SPAR also is testing a new program, in cooperation with several retail chains, called "Team Marketing," which guarantees retailer performance verified through retail audits. Mr. Brown says the approach may be the answer to the prisoner's dilemma in trade promotion by fostering cooperation in selling more product and channeling the huge annual investment in trade promotions into productive use. —R.E.

"There's a lot less intuitive gut feel in trade promotion and a lot more trying to measure what you get for your promotional dollars," Mr. Jeans says.

The growing tendency to focus on local market conditions is a dramatic change from trade promotion strategies of recent years, says Michael Hartnett, manager of business analysis for Bristol-Myers Co., New York.

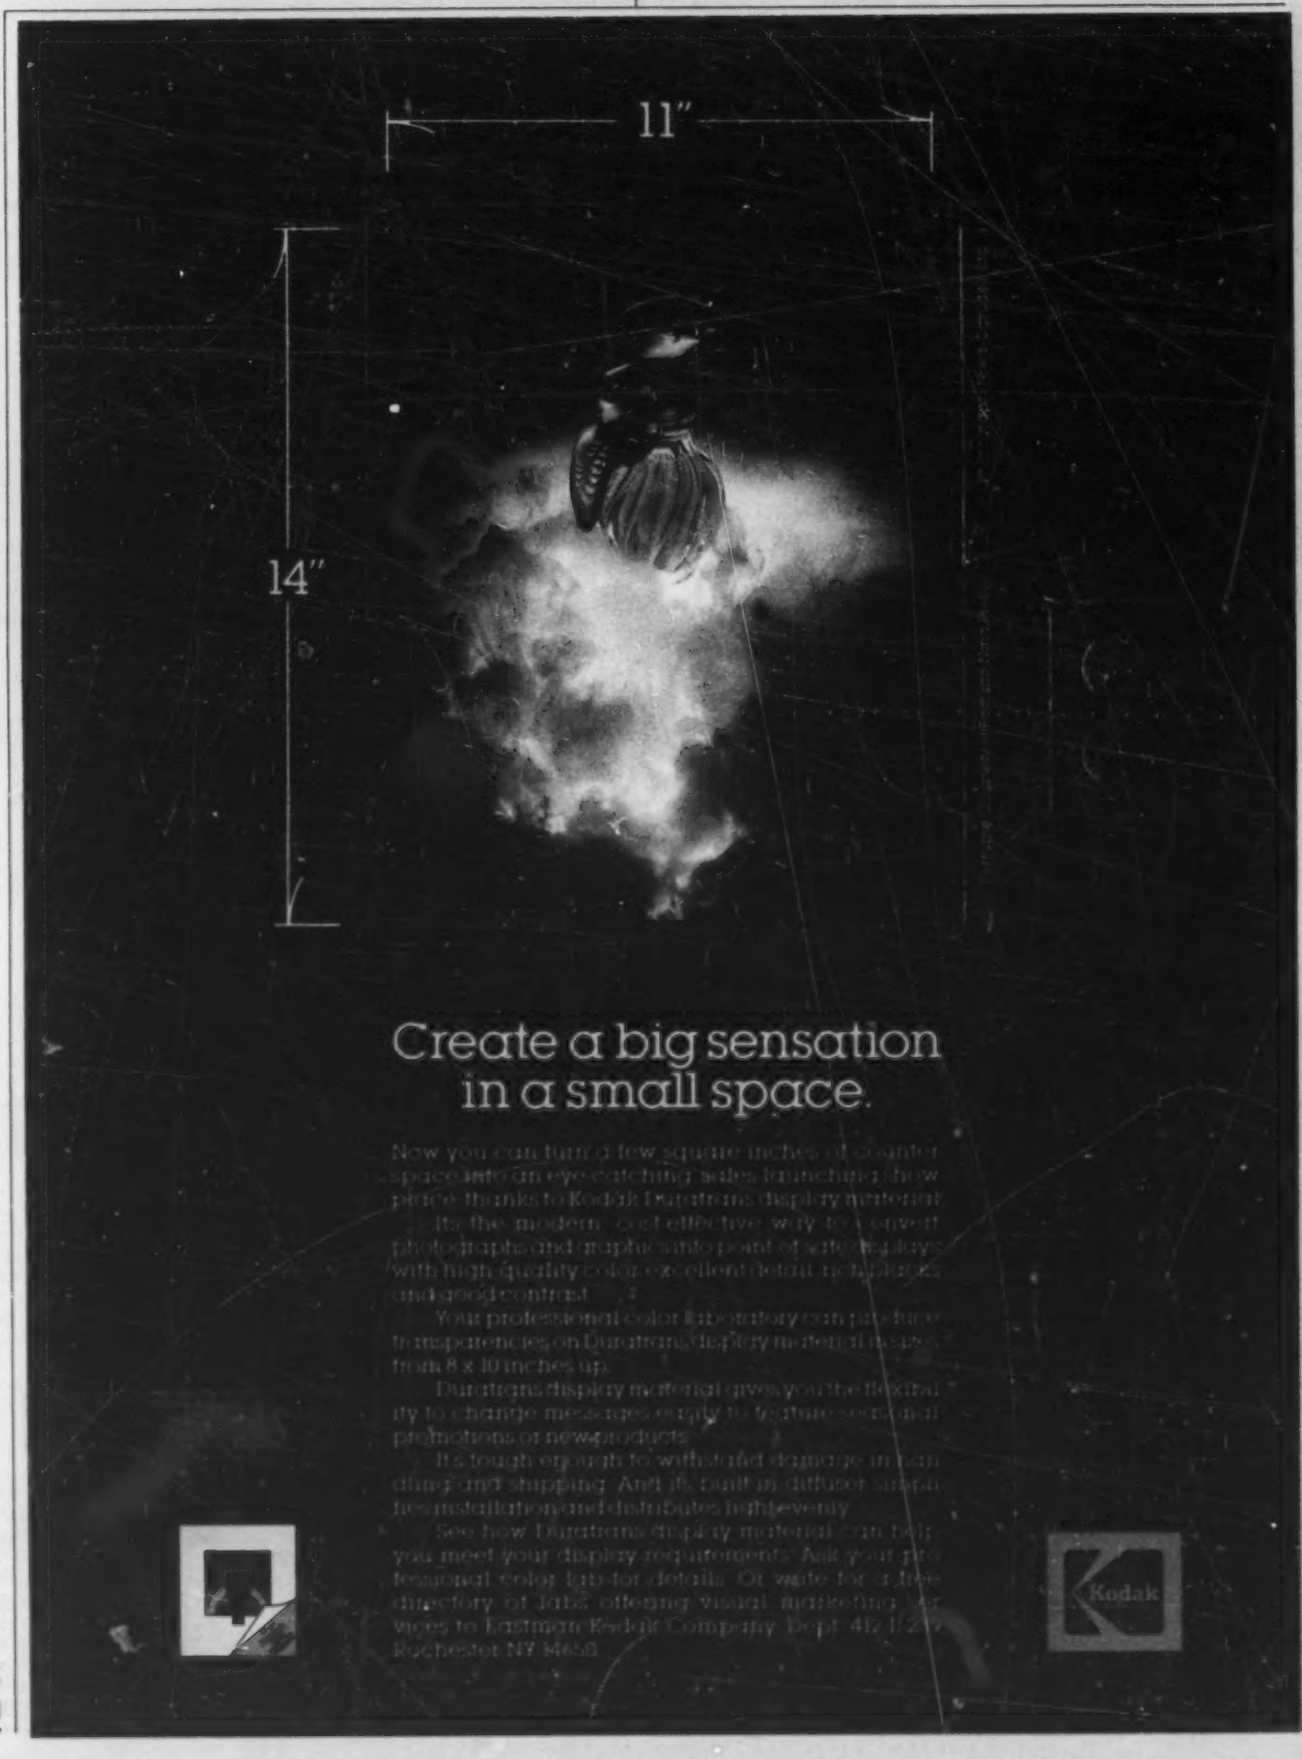
"The 'global marketing' concept has really turned 180 degrees over the past few years. There's a lot more local marketing going on today," he says.

One reason is scanner data, which has given retailers a better picture of buying patterns. For example, a retailer in a market with a high percentage of elderly residents might promote Bufferin as a headache remedy for primary users and as a product to treat the pain of arthritis for secondary users.

"The retailers really know their stores and we can learn a lot on how to market in the neighborhoods," he says. "With scanner data, all of a sudden, local marketing becomes doable."

Successful trade promotion isn't easy, but the key to making it work is that "everybody wins," says Pepe Charles, product manager-new products for S.C. Johnson & Son, Racine, Wis.

"It all comes back to the fact that you've got to put dollars in everybody's pocket, the consumer, the trade, your sales force and eventually yourself through increased profits."



Category, regional rivals determine strategy

By Richard Edel

Feature ad support, product positioning and brand share all influence trade promotion spending for branded products. But the nature of competition in each category and region ultimately determines the promotional strategy.

In categories with a single dominant brand, the top spot spends a smaller percentage of advertising dollars than secondary brands for retail ad support to keep the lion's share of consumer purchases, says Bob Schmitz, vp-research for Majers Corp., Omaha, Neb.

In categories with two brand leaders, called "brand confrontation categories," the link between market share and retail ad support is much closer, with the No. 3 brand having to spend more to get less, he says.

The more personalized the product, the less likely price will be a factor in buying decisions.

Dominant brands get and keep their positions through balanced marketing strategies using coupons, advertising, product development and feature price promotion. Secondary brands tend to lean much more heavily on price promotion, which means any slippage in retail ad support usually precedes a decline in brand share position, Mr. Schmitz says.

How do manufacturers get themselves into dominant or secondary positions?

"It's a chicken and egg proposition," Mr. Schmitz says.

Several factors can affect jockeying for position in each category, marketers say. One factor is brand differentiation. Coffee, for example, comes in a variety of grinds and flavors that build brand loyalty on taste.

Another factor is how much a person identifies with a product, such as a particular shade of lipstick or eye shadow. The more personalized the product, the less likely price will be a factor in buying decisions.

A third factor is substitutability. To a large degree, snack foods, soft drinks, paper towels, cookies and other products are easily substituted for one another depending on the degree of brand loyalty.

The factors that cause consumers to choose one product over another have predictable effects on the nature of promotion in all product categories, marketers say. But the effect also varies greatly by region, which is a fourth and sometimes critically important factor in promotional strategy.

How these factors affect retail promotion in the salty snack category, for example, is complicated because the category has a single dominant national brand: Fritos corn chips from the Dallas-based Frito-Lay division of PepsiCo.

Potato chips, however, are brand confrontational by region. Frito-Lay competes against Borden's Atlanta-based Wise Foods division in one market, Borden's Guy's Foods division, Liberty, Mo., in another, and a host of other regional companies.

Frito-Lay uses a balanced marketing attack in both categories, never discounting as deeply as the regionals, but remaining flexible, says James Hines, marketing director for Frito-Lay.

"What we would like to feel is that we use the strength of our branded franchise to offset more [trade promotion] spending by the regionals," Mr. Hines says. This places retailers in a position of using scanner data to evaluate full-price volume generated by a top brand against the lure of incremental volume and profits to be gained from discounts by regionals.

Frito-Lay also focuses on building its brand franchise through advertising and product development. This tends to differentiate the brand through development of new flavors and packaging. For example, Frito-Lay recently introduced new flavors in its O'Grady's, Fritos and Doritos lines.

Frito-Lay is reacting to growing retailer influence over promotional strategies by adopting a teamwork approach to building sales and profits, Mr. Hines says. It uses the clout of its 9,400-member direct sales force to conduct studies on floor space allocation, point-of-purchase materials, shelf settings, promotional frequency and salty snack strategies.

Some People Don't Take Game Promotions As Seriously As They Should!

At Wallace Games, we do. Perhaps that's why we're one of the world's leading game suppliers, producing over 3 billion game tickets in the last 10 years. During that time, we've designed and implemented hundreds of successful games and sweepstakes worldwide. Each one individually created to accomplish the specific marketing objectives of customers such as Amoco, Kroger, Safeway, Super Valu, The American Dairy Association, and many more. Truly effective game promotions don't come in a box. You won't find reliable service and expertise on a checklist either. Don't settle for a "package deal". Talk to us before your next promotion.

Retailers welcome this advice, and they are keenly aware of changes that improve profits, he says.

The trend toward increasing use of price promotion by secondary brands in the product category, however, is well documented.

Competitors' marketing strategies usually involve creating "me-too" products and buying market share through price promotion, Majers Corp.'s Mr. Schmitz says.

This trend concerns Frito-Lay, but isn't stopping it from pushing ahead with its own brand objectives, Mr. Schmitz says.

"Any time one element of the marketing mix tends to grow [out of proportion], you have to take a look and make sure you've got the right dynamics," the Majers Corp. executive says. "But we prefer to do what's best for our brands."

Big regional snack makers, who have more to lose, are worried.

"Generally, more manufacturers have gone heavily into price promotion of one kind or another," says a spokesman for Jay's Foods in Chicago.

"Couponing is getting bigger all the time. It's unbelievable," he says.

Fortunately, many snack products have limited shelf life, which prevents retailers from stocking warehouses on promotions. This forces producers into promoting on a program.

"You have to budget properly, or you're all through promoting by June," the Jay's spokesman says.

Another brand confrontation category is the $1 billion market for yogurt where Dannon, Yoplait and Kellogg Co.'s Whitney's are the top three brands with 24% share, 19% and 10%, respectively.

Because the category is differentiated and tends to be personalized, price promotion has a minor effect on top brands.

But price promotion among regional and private-label brands is red hot, which could be a dangerous trend for retailers, says Dick Greenberg, director-marketing at Dannon Co., Long Island City, N.Y.

With yogurt's characteristics —light, healthful, ready to eat— there is a big opportunity to expand market penetration with new products and packaging, advertising and consumer promotion.

The worst approach is to focus on trade deals, Mr. Greenberg says.

"The grocery trade may be making a big mistake by promoting these sundry brands. They severely cannibalize the trade's own private-label brands," he says. "What we're taking strong steps to prevent is letting yogurt take a loss-leader posture."

Spokesmen for Yoplait and Whitney's agree there is plenty of room to grow, but each brand has to decide whether growth will result in the long-term from building brand franchise or from the short-term strategy of price promotion.

Phone offers action at push of button

By Eileen Norris

The come-on is hard to pass up—great new books at a fraction of the cost. But after a while, even that pales.

Then comes the sweepstakes and the excitement is back. Just call a toll-free telephone number, listen to the computer's instructions and use the Touch-Tone phone to punch out an identifying account number.

Then the unexpected: A computer voice pitches a hot new novel. Push button 1 to order, button 2 to decline.

Gotcha. Another book sold.

It's neat and gimmicky and instantly gratifying, says Jim Hertel, vp-marketing at San Francisco-based Dial Info, an interactive telephone/computer developer of telepromotions. He thinks it's a winner. So will an unidentified book publisher planning to use it sometime this year, he says.

"That's why people use the telephone—instant gratification," Mr. Hertel says. "But to us the phone is also a computer that can do many of the futuristic things, like at-home shopping and banking, that have been talked about for years."

Mr. Hertel estimates that about 60% of the public has at least one Touch-Tone phone at home, and Dial Info's research indicates about 85% of the public has access to a Touch-Tone phone—either at home or at work.

That statistic has built a fast track for a company that started out quietly in 1984 providing stock quotations and other market data through an interactive computer system capable of responding to each caller's stock needs.

Later that year, Dial Info added the Jeanne Dixon horoscope service, which asks for the day, month and year of birth and then provides a reading from a computer that holds 36,500 different horoscopes each are turning to sweepstakes and other promotions to stimulate the sluggish personal computer market, for example.

Jostling for attention

"The key is that marketers are beginning to realize the need for value-added promotions to build brand loyalty and identification, rather than just sales volume," says Jeffrey McElnea, president of Einson-Freeman in Paramus, N.J.

"Trade promotions have always been kind of value-subtracted things," the past president of the Council of Sales Promotion Agencies says.

Einson-Freeman has about 60 employes in four offices, including Chicago, San Francisco and Boston, and gross revenues of more than $20 million, according to Mr. McElnea.

"Sales promotion agencies are being called to the table more and more for strategic planning and are being called upon to develop promotions that last for one or more years, rather than one or two months."

The long-running Pepsi Challenge promotion is the example that several promotion executives point to when they discuss the value of long-term promotion.

"It was just a glorified sampling program, but it ran for nearly eight years and it became the nucleus of Pepsi's assault on Coke. It really shook up the competition," Mr. McElnea says.

Airline frequent flier campaigns are another example of long-term continuity-building promotions, and Mr. McElnea says consumers can expect more such programs applied to more services.

> "Marketers are beginning to realize the need for value-added promotions to build brand loyalty and identification . . . ."
> Jeffrey McElnea, Einson-Freeman

Long-term consumer promotions have another strategic value, says Allyn Miller, president of Flair Communications, Chicago, generally believed to be the largest independent sales promotion agency with more than 140 employes in offices in Chicago, Detroit, Los Angeles, New York and San Francisco.

"Companies who can't compete with advertising dollars may be able to compete in some areas with promotion spending. Stroh's beer, for example, can't possibly compete with the advertising spending of Anheuser-Busch on television, but it can compete in sales promotion with a good creative campaign," Mr. Miller says.

"And marketers are beginning to realize that sales promotion can have that kind of effectiveness if it runs over a longer term," he says.

Flair is managing merchandising and collateral support for the "Stroh's is spoken here" advertising campaign created by Marschalk Co., Detroit. Specialty point-of-sale material will target black and Hispanic consumers as well as a general audience.

Marketers are beginning to realize the flexibility of sales promotion, Mr. Miller says.

For example, Beatrice Cos., based in Chicago, ordered 124 versions of a food products promotion to meet regional variations in sales and product identification.

"Consumer promotion is continuing to grow both in dollars and sophistication, and we see consumer promotion growing to 70% of the total dollars spent on sales promotion" by 1990, Mr. Miller says.

"As sales promotion agencies get more sophisticated and as consumer education grows, consumer promotions will get more sophisticated and the field can't help but grow."

Associate editor Len Strazewski coordinated this report on Sales Promotion.

SHOOTS

Introducing Shoots, a weekly listing of recently produced commercials, listing the products, agencies and production houses. Tv Anails returns next week.

WonderWhims, an upcoming line of fantasy dolls from Panosh Place, Cherry Hill, N.J., has completed a 60-second spot and two 30-second "lifts," via agency Towne, Silverstein & Rotter and production house Griner/Cuesta & Associates, both New York. The spots feature illusionist Doug Henning and wife, Debby (who created the line), plus live-action shots of baby animals, from goats to birds.

The spot will open with the birth of a butterfly—the most time-consuming element of the 11-day shoot. Senior copywriter: Valerie Nadler; director: Michael Schrom, Griner/Cuesta.

Fibber, a new board game due from Maruca Industries, Passaic, N.J., via agency Opus Group, Ridgewood, N.J., and production shop Corona Color, New York, will be promoted in a 30-second spot. It will depict family members playing the game and finding their noses growing in Pinocchio fashion each time they fib. A $2.5 million spot tv effort begins April 1. Creative director-copywriter: Joe Grasso, president, Opus Group; producer and director: George Corti and Yael Woll, Corona Color.

Magician Doug Henning and wife, Debby

Close-Up lip balm, a new product from Lever Bros., has finished a 15-second spot via J. Walter Thompson USA and George M. Cochran Film Productions, all New York. Borrowing somewhat from the Close-Up toothpaste commercials, the lip balm 15 shows a young couple kissing. Senior creative director: Mimi Emilita, JWT; producer: Michael LaGattuta, JWT; director: George Cochran. ■

ON THE DIAL

"Rock Connections" is a new 15-week series from CBS Radio, New York, that gives a contemporary perspective of album rock's first 20 years, starting in 1966. The one-hour weekly show, designed for 25-to-34-year-olds, bows over the May 24 to 26 weekend with Mike Harrison, disc jockey and president of Goodphone Communications as the host. Commercial avails and clearances now are being arranged.

"James Bacon in Hollywood" is the first program from All Star Radio Network, Los Angeles, a new network started by Rhonda Kramer and Kenny Green, owners of LA Network. The five-hour, daily interview/talk show, hosted by longtime columnist James Bacon, features celebrity guests from the tv, film and rock music worlds. Advertisers include Jeffrey Martin Inc. Clearances are now under way, with the show aiming for a Feb. 17 start.

"Star Trak Profiles," a one-hour show airing over the Westwood One Radio Networks, Culver City, Cal., will feature an exclusive interview with singer/actress/comedienne Bette Midler during the week of Feb. 17. Also featured during the show is a full catalog of Ms. Midler's recordings. Cleared by more than 200 stations, the show includes Dodge among its sponsors.

Bert Kleinman and Bette Midler

"Don Criqui on Sports" is a new 90-second weekday feature by NBC Radio Network. Broadcast live Monday through Friday at 4:30 p.m. (ET), Mr. Criqui discusses events in the sports field. Sponsors include Sears, Roebuck and State Farm Insurance, with station clearances just starting.

"The Best of Tellin' It Like It Was" is a special 20-part series airing on Westwood One Radio Networks through February to commemorate national Black History Month. Now being cleared, the show includes Hormel chili and Wendy's among its advertisers.

"Album Party," a one-hour, call-in show by NBC Radio Entertainment that offers listeners the opportunity to speak with their favorite stars via a toll-free number, will feature Paul Rodgers and Jimmy Page of The Firm on Feb. 13. Advertisers include Levi's 501 jeans and Agree shampoo. Now being cleared, the show's ad closing is Feb. 13. ■

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decidedly a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

Bad timing for '60 Minutes'

CBS pushed "60 Minutes" up to a 9 p.m. (ET) berth to avert a bruising by NBC's "Super Bowl XX" broadcast. But the gamble didn't pay off. The show was crushed by 20 share points by the postgame show. Then NBC's heavily promoted "The Last Precinct" continued the humiliation by scoring a 6-share win over the CBS stalwart, the first defeat for "60 Minutes" this year. The Super Bowl was a headache for both ABC and CBS, but it was CBS that needed the strongest aspirin. NBC held the game's carryover audience so firmly that even CBS' usually reliable "Murder, She Wrote" was aced. On Saturday, NBC successfully fanned the Bowl hysteria with "Bob Hope's All-Star Super Bowl Party," a clinker that shot down "Airwolf" and ABC's new "Redd Foxx Show." The most notable victories of the week: "Golden Girls" and "227." Both shows won by enormous margins over the "CBS Reports" special on the black family and ABC's "Lady Blue." Over all, NBC had a rousing week. Its solid shows kept building—"Miami Vice" got one of its largest victories of the season—while newcomers got good audience sampling. "Disney's Living Seas," a one-time-only replacement for "Misfits of Science," squeezed out a 1-share-point win over its competition. "Remington Steele" landed temporarily in "Hunters's" slot and picked up that show's audience. (Steele's normal Tuesday slot will be donated to "American Almanac" on March 4.) ABC had a good week despite NBC strength. The network took Monday with "The American Music Awards," then went on to nearly sweep Tuesday and Wednesday. ■

Hello, Goodby

The principals in Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein never met the late, legendary Howard Gossage, but the influence of the maverick San Francisco adman lingers on. For a recent pitch to Honda, GB&S stole a page from the master's book. They spruced up their simple offices in a former seed and plant warehouse with a rented $3,000 hallway carpet and marble tables. They mocked up empty rooms to look like offices and brought in friends to sit at desks and telephone each other. They spent more for flowers than they spend for a secretary's annual salary. What worked for Gossage, however, failed these young disciples. The Japanese didn't buy GB&S, but GB&S did learn a lesson: Be yourself. See Page 4.

Wexler cool to ad medium

Haskell Wexler, the celebrated feature film director of photography, spends one-third of his professional life filming 30-second and 60-second spots that fuel American consumerism, yet he holds the advertising industry, and business in general, in contempt. "There is an assumption in the world of advertising that if someone is willing to pay money, it's publicizable." See Page 10.

Special Report—Test-Marketing

Test-marketing has entered the world of high-tech, but it still lacks one system that can provide all the information marketers need, quickly and accurately. To try to answer the question "Will the product sell?" marketers are relying on their own research, experience and instincts, calling on test-market specialists for services and data specific to the marketers' businesses, and creating their own databases and markets. MCI disconnects Ally

WASHINGTON—MCI Communications Corp. has dismissed longtime agency Ally & Gargano and has awarded its entire $40 million long-distance ad business to D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles. A&G this week let go about 20 employes, including several staffers who worked on MCI, but agency chairman Amil Gargano said the layoffs were "not directly related" to the MCI account loss. The MCI action is the latest in a series of blue-chip account losses for the agency. A&G, MCI's lead shop since 1979, has handled its consumer ads; DMB&B previously only handled MCI ads aimed at business customers (AA, Feb. 6).

Scali buys FMR

NEW YORK—Ogilvy Group's Scali, McCabe, Sloves unit has acquired for $6.25 million a "majority interest" in Fallon McElligott Rice, Minneapolis. FMR becomes an independent subsidiary of Scali, which billed an estimated $400 million in 1985. FMR's name won't change; Pat Fallon will remain president and Tom McElligott vp-creative director at the agency, which had '85 billings of $80 million. Ogilvy earlier made its San Francisco office, like FMR a strong creative shop, an independent unit named Hal Riney & Partners.

Warwick gets cooler

BROOKLYN, N.Y.—Joseph Victori Wines has assigned its $10 million Calvin Cooler account to Warwick Advertising, New York, from SBA, an affiliate of Shapiro, Bartolone, Budrow.

Cap Cities denies layoffs

NEW YORK—Capital Cities/ABC denies it is planning to lay off 1,250 to 2,000 employes Feb. 14 in the legal, entertainment and publicity departments as part of a companywide austerity move. "The Valentine's Day Massacre," as insiders are calling the reported move, could affect employes who have been with the company less than 10 years and are therefore ineligible for the ABC pension plan. Spokesmen said there will be gradual attrition of employes in various departments.

Fotomat picks Bohbot

NEW YORK—Fotomat Corp., St. Petersburg, Fla., has named Bohbot & Cohn here as agency of record for its $3.5 million in tv and radio buying, succeeding Botway/Libov. Bohbot & Cohn also has been named broadcast and print agency of record on Pressman Toy Corp.'s $4 million board and videocassette games account. Cohen & Marino, the previous agency, retains creative responsibilities for various Pressman games.

If more major sports events are opened to sponsorships, a la a "Budweiser Super Bowl" (AA, Feb. 3 et seq.), would the potential marketing benefits be worth the probable cost?

Patrick Iorio, vp-manager of media operations, Geers Gross Advertising: "Full sponsorship provides benefits like high visibility and impact. It's very important for dealer merchandising. The only obstacle to full sponsorship is out-of-pocket. Many advertisers' entire budgets would be spent in one such event. Most advertisers don't want or need full sponsorship because there are so many sports events to pick and choose from today. Besides, do you remember who the major sponsor was in the Super Bowl or the World Series?"

P. IORIO

M. WHITE

Mike White, senior vp-director of media resources, Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago: "There would have to be a fair amount of research on whether there would be a benefit. Is the 'Budweiser Super Bowl' something that's a positive for viewers or would it irritate or offend people? It might be a problem if the public feels its event has been usurped by a brand. I wouldn't want Mattel to own Christmas."

Thomas Winner, senior vp-director of broadcast media operations, William Esty Co., New York: "Getting a client's name on the event generates some value but you can also use it for internal merchandising, entertaining and setting up some type of dealer sales incentive promotions. There's just a lot of things a client could do as a corporate sponsor. They get the association, which is a plus, and can use it for internal reasons, whatever they may be. If the benefit is more than cost then it's an excellent deal."

T. WINNER

P. McKEON

Patrick McKeon, senior vp-director of media, Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, Chicago: "Yes and no. If you're Budweiser and in a tough marketing battle, such sponsorships are worth it. You also need to be large enough to have the additional money to use elsewhere—for point-of-sale, sweepstakes, dealer incentives and such. But if you're the average advertiser, there's no way for the costs to be paid back in pure exposure."

John Meskil, exec vp-media and administration, Warwick Advertising, New York: "What you ask is do you buy it for merchandising or media benefits? Essentially, we buy it for media benefits. In some instances it's worth it if it's part of your major advertising thrust. In a sense, it's not a media buy but a marketing buy. You can't expect to buy [the event] most efficiently. [But] the main thing you're looking for today is impact so [this would allow the advertiser] to go for less reach but more impact against the target."

Traveling through a maze of choices

By Julie Franz

Every time a consumer goods company decides to market a new product, it enters a maze of options.

Should the item be test marketed or rolled out immediately? Is in-market, electronic or simulated testing the way to go? Which method will provide the best gauge of success—without sacrificing valuable time?

Despite the arrival of increasingly sophisticated testing methods promising to make those decisions easier, marketers remain frustrated. No one system can provide all the information they need, quickly and accurately, let alone answer the ultimate question: Will the product sell?

Despite all the promises, despite all the available data, not even state-of-the-art market research has been able to completely answer this question.

So although test marketing methods often help spot big winners and losers, many marketers have decided to skip the testing process and rely on their own research, experience and instincts to predict product success. Marketers also are asking test-market specialists for services and data that are more specific to their businesses—and if that proves unavailable, creating databases and markets of their own.

New products introduced into food and drugstores

The failure rate of new products remains high, says Dick Lukey, associate research director-new product procedures for Leo Burnett USA, Chicago. Five of every ten products tested using simulated test markets are killed, he says. Of the products that make it into national distribution, 70% either are pulled off shelves or never reach their estimated sales potential.

This could be the result of a lack of innovation among new products, he says; most new products today take the form of line or flavor extensions of established brand names. Dancer Fitzgerald Sample's "New Product News" reports that although 2,206 new products were in-

Picking panel members to pass judgment

By Julie Liesse Erickson

New products do not just show up on the shelves of your supermarket. Manufacturers need to know what consumers think of their creations. And soon many of you will have a say in which products make it and which don't."

Sounds irresistible—the chance to sound off to consumer product marketers.

"You will get a unique opportunity to . . . make sure manufacturers make those correct decisions and therefore hold down the cost of consumer products that will be entering the market."

Great—a chance to save money, too.

Your town has been selected because of its "all-American characteristics—it's a good barometer of consumer likes and dislikes.

"And it all starts in Boise."

This is part of the tv spot that introduced the citizens of Boise, Ida., to ViewScan, the grocery-scanning test marketing service of Burke Marketing Services. In July, Boise became the system's newest market, as 2,500 households joined 17,500 others in seven other cities as regular ViewScan panelists.

Every year, thousands of households around the U.S. get a chance to speak to product marketers through test marketing services such as ViewScan. In doing so, they act as spokesmen for the millions of Americans who also shop for and purchase groceries.

Burke Marketing Services introduces its ViewScan grocery-scanning test marketing service to the residents of Boise, Ida.

They also are making life-and-death decisions for the new consumer products being tested in their supermarkets and on their cable tv systems.

But who are these consumers?

Although each of the three leading test marketing companies, Burke, Information Resources Inc. and A.C. Nielsen Co., has its own system, recruitment techniques for Burke and IRI are almost identical.

Shoppers are approached in participating grocery stores and drugstores and given a brief description of the scanning service. If interested in becoming panel members, shopppers fill out applications.

The only absolute requirement of panel membership, usually, is being hooked up to the local cable tv system. The test marketing companies say they try for a sample of households with demographics that match those of the nation as a whole.

Panelists receive an ID card resembling a credit card. Their only obligation is to show the card to checkers as they pay for groceries, so their purchases can be identified and entered into the store's computer.

If they shop in a store that does not participate in the scanning system, panelists are asked to record those purchases in a written diary, using Universal Product Code numbers.

ViewScan entered the Boise market with a bang, says Reg Rhodes, president of the Cincinnati-based company. Before in-store recruitment began, Boise residents were exposed to ViewScan and its history through a press conference to announce the city as "the test market of the future," three weeks of cable tv spots and newspaper ads in the Idaho Statesman. "This was the first time in panel recruiting history that such a major pr effort was undertaken," Mr. Rhodes says. The program was coordinated by Burson-Marstellar, Chicago.

As part of the Boise campaign, Burke donated 25 cents to the local Special Olympics for each resident it interviewed. The total reached about $5,000, Mr. Rhodes says.

ViewScan and IRI's BehaviorScan panelists also receive incentives for regular participation, ranging from monthly prizes to computer printouts of their grocery purchases during the month.

A.C. Nielsen Co.'s Testsight service, which became fully operational in two cities July 1, offers similar incentives, but its recruitment procedures are different, says Larry Gold, vp-marketing for the Deerfield, Ill.-based company. "We call other types of recruitment 'convenience-type sampling,'" he says. "Good testing depends on a good probability sample. We think a convenience sample is not sub-

Putting average cities on test marketing map

By Julie Skur Hill

Minneapolis and Buffalo, N.Y., are just a couple of average towns.

They are so average that, demographically speaking, they are among the hottest test markets in the U.S.

Minneapolis is probably the most popular test market, says Ira Weinblatt, senior vp at Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York, which every other year compiles the best-known list of top test markets. From 1983 to the third quarter of 1985, Minneapolis served as the laboratory for more than 110 product tests, according to DFS figures. The agency tracks market tests through its monthly publication, "New Product News."

But while Mr. Weinblatt dances to a Twin Cities tune, Barry Sinrod shuffles toward Buffalo. Mr. Sinrod is president of the Sinrod Marketing Group, Hicksville, N.Y., which puts out another frequently consulted ranking of test markets.

"Buffalo continues to be a good market," Mr. Sinrod says. "It's one of our favorites. It seems to be the right size," with a population of about 1 million.

Buffalo also is on the DFS list, which now numbers 42 preferred test markets, out of 200 U.S. Areas of Dominant Influence. Sinrod lists 21 cities.

Twelve cities in addition to Buffalo make both lists: Albany, N.Y.; Chattanooga, Tenn.; Des Moines, Ia.; Evansville, Ind.; Grand Rapids, Mich.; Green Bay, Wis.; Indianapolis; Oklahoma City; Omaha, Neb.; Orlando, Fla.; Peoria, Ill., and Rochester, N.Y.

The DFS standout, Minneapolis, didn't make the Sinrod roster. The beauty of a test market often lies in the eye of the beholder. DFS doesn't see its list as a popularity contest. "Our list is not built on what's hot, what's not," Mr. Weinblatt says.

Markets must meet rigid statistical standards on demographics, media isolation and media costs, no matter how popular a test market it is, he says. So it isn't Minneapolis' popularity as a test market that causes it to make the DFS list. Rather, its superb demographics and media characteristics cause it to be popular.

What makes a good test market? "We look for markets that are demographically close to the average, that reflect the real world," Mr. Weinblatt says.

He says DFS prefers markets with isolated, self-contained media environments. The ideal test market offers local media buys that replicate what the national buys would be, and local media coverage that delivers the ject to statistical analysis."

Picking panel members

When Nielsen entered its two Testsight markets—Sioux Falls, S.D., and Springfield, Mo.—in 1985, it used a random sample from the local telephone books to select panelists. If residents responded positively to the first phone call, they received a questionnaire through the mail.

After receiving a questionnaire from a household, Nielsen field representatives would make an appointment for a personal interview to sign up a household as a panel member. The company sought out 4,000 households in each market—about 12% of the Sioux Falls population and about 8% of Springfield—with an eventual 2,500-member size in mind.

But despite all this initial attention, panelists largely are unaware of their power, say the test marketing companies that use them.

"For the most part, I think it just becomes a habit, a routine," says Jane Michaels, senior manager for Shoppers' Hotline, Chicago-based IRI's panel, which uses about 6,000 households in each of the company's eight test markets. "They're buying what they want, not what they think they should buy."

"What we think happens is that it takes a certain period of time for the panel to settle down, that the novelty of carrying a card, being part of the panel causes some extra attention to shopping habits," Mr. Rhodes says. "After the panel settles down, it falls into a normal routine of showing your card to the cashier. Our research shows the panelist's behavior is not materially affected by his participation on the panel."

But this is not necessarily the case with consumers who use paper diaries to record shopping habits, he says. "Now, with a paper diary, industry execs worried about panelists being much more attuned to prices, more price-sensitive and prone to look for specials than the normal consumer," he says.

Mr. Gold agrees. "When we used paper diaries, consumers became very aware of and sensitive to pricing and product differences. These [Testsight] households are relatively passive," he says, "and that's the way we want them to be."

ViewScan added 2,500 households in Boise, Ida.

majority of households in the area. It's critical that the market in question have its own media and be free from tv spillover from other ADIs. The penetration of cable tv must be close to the U.S. average.

Finally, Mr. Weinblatt says, "We look for reasonably priced media markets. Markets that are suitable otherwise may be avoided if the media is overpriced."

Sinrod similarly uses demographics to develop its list, but it also considers the number of client requests for a given city and distributor cooperation in proposed markets, Mr. Sinrod says.

The DFS list has a high concentration of markets in the Midwest, while the Sinrod cities are fairly evenly spread across the U.S. Says Mr. Weinblatt of DFS: "It is hard to find [West] Coast markets. A lot are close together, involving large populations. We don't like to commit to markets that large. Demographics are more average in Middle America."

Mr. Sinrod disagrees. "There is no reason to have only the Midwest. There are good markets around the country." He says economic, product and weather considerations all "make it necessary to have markets scattered."

The Sinrod ranking includes two Vermont markets, Burlington and Bennington, that aren't on the DFS list. "Burlington is an up-and-coming market," Mr. Sinrod says.

Markets fall in and out of favor. Two Ohio markets, Toledo and Dayton, made it to the DFS list for the first time last year, while seven markets appearing on the previous list in 1983 didn't make the grade for 1985. Three were dropped for media efficiency problems: Boise, Ida.; Colorado Springs, Colo., and Phoenix, Ariz. Demographic imbalances eliminated four others: Knoxville, Tenn.; Lexington, Ky.; Little Rock, Ark., and Sacramento, Cal.

Peoria, long considered America's favorite guinea pig, was cut from the 1983 DFS list. The town's high cable tv penetration and high unemployment, a result of a strike and hard times at Caterpillar Tractor Co., made Peoria less than typical, Mr. Weinblatt says.

But because Caterpillar's problems have lessened somewhat, and the rest of America has caught up with Peoria's cable concentration, the downstate Illinois city has the distinction of being "average" again—and back among the preferred test markets of both DFS and Sinrod.

troduced in 1985, an additional 2,670 line extensions—of flavor, color or other characteristics—appeared on grocery store shelves.

Whatever the reason, the failure rate stirs debate among marketers and their ad agencies about the best way to ensure success with a new product.

The frequent loser in that debate is conventional in-market testing, which has battled unsuccessfully against electronic and simulated testing programs. Mr. Lukey says Burnett's client usage of simulated test markets has increased from an average of three a year during the 1970s to an average of 30 annually today.

In a classical test market, a company such as Quaker Oats Co., Chicago, gives a new product to sales staff in four or five markets, where it is sold into grocery stores. Advertising is placed, purchase information is tracked, and the probability of success on a larger scale is projected.

But classical test marketing such as this adds three months or more to the test market process—time that marketers, worried about the competition's response, don't want to spend.

"People aren't prepared to wait that long anymore, given the pace of new product activity in the market," says John Blair, Quaker vp-marketing research.

In addition, the cost of classical test marketing is substantially greater than that of electronic testing, he says. Electronic testing usually involves only two or three markets, constituting about 1% of the total U.S. population, while an in-market test is done in five or more markets that add up to about 3% to 5% of the nation. Media and sales force utilization costs multiply accordingly.

Information Resources Inc., a leading market researcher, estimates it costs $3.1 million, on the average, to take a product from r&d through the conventional test market process. But Hercules Segalas, an analyst with Drexel Burnham Lambert, New York, says Procter & Gamble spent $15 million developing Duncan Hines ready-to-eat cookies in test market.

Paying for retail shelf space

By Laurie Freeman

Once a new product makes it over the test marketing hurdles, it faces another stumbling block. Rising entry fees, called slotting allowances, add to the cost of placing new products in grocery stores.

Slotting allowances flourish. There are no set rules; each store has its own policy, ranging from discounts on cases of goods to outright dollar payments. Many chains do not demand a slotting allowance, but most marketers now offer one.

"We have a minimum slotting allowance of $500 for each new item accepted," says a Green Bay, Wis.-based buyer. "The larger companies, like Procter & Gamble, refuse to pay it, but they make up for it in other ways. Others, like Church & Dwight, pay us to take their items."

Policies range from discounts on cases of goods to dollar payments.

In other cities, slotting allowances range from $200 to $300, the larger payments being demanded for slow-moving items such as condiments. "The stuff we don't need or want, we make the company pay to get it on the shelves," a Kansas City, Mo.-based buyer says.

But in many ways, slotting allowances present a Catch-22 situation. "We don't want to ever be in the position of having refused an item, then have customers come in with their coupons looking for it. That's the best way to lose customers to the store down the street," a midwestern buyer says.

For a marketer, not even big slotting allowances guarantee product placement. "We've turned down items with allowances because we don't think they'll sell," the Kansas City buyer says.

vertising mockups, receive a sales incentive (such as a coupon) and shop in a mock-up grocery or drug store. The consumers who actually buy the "product" are called at home and surveyed once they've had a chance to use it. The product's sales potential is modeled from that.

Using simulated test markets allows marketers to narrow the variables before entering actual test markets. In addition, the process also can stop marketers from putting disasters into in-market test and can eliminate the need for a test market by uncovering overnight successes.

But in using speeded-up testing systems, the package goods industry has to guard against reducing the time of a test market to dangerously low levels, says Jim Crimmins, director-marketing decision systems for Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago.

Some products, such as condiments, have long purchase cycles; therefore, they require more time in test market. Other products, including soap, have a short purchase cycle. Likewise, if seasonal products aren't left in test long enough or at the right time, the data could be skewed.

Companies trying to shorten in-market tests, which can range from just months to years, also sometimes find the product doesn't fare as well as expected once national distribution is achieved. Cincinnati-based Procter & Gamble, for example, tested its encapsulated aspirin, Encaprin, for only three months before rolling it nationally in June, 1984. Although analysts say Encaprin did very well in its short-lived test, the brand is struggling to find a national niche. Supported in its first year by an estimated $35 million to $50 million campaign from Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York, Encaprin has managed less than a 1% share of the $1.2 billion U.S. pain reliever market.

Using simulated test markets allows marketers to narrow the variables before entering actual test markets.

Consumer products marketers also are becoming disillusioned with electronic, scanner-based technologies for providing data that looks scientific but often isn't, Needham's Mr. Crimmins says. To illustrate, he points to scanner tests that typically employ a database of 2,500 consumers, usually cut in half to test two variables. Each of those 1,250-consumer groups then are classified by demographics into subgroups.

In the worst case, the final test data might use a sample of only eight people to project behavior for all white males between the ages of 25 and 30, Mr. Crimmins says.

"This isn't a criticism of the

> "The cost of a failed national introduction is monumental compared with a failed in-market test."
> Dick Lukey
> Leo Burnett USA

Some marketers remain fans of conventional in-market tests. "There's no real substitute for getting out and doing" an on-site test. The others are mainly formula driven, says Ira Weinblatt, senior vp-director of media planning, Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York.

The traditional sell-in test market still serves to minimize the risk of a bomb. Companies tend to eliminate conventional test marketing for me-too or line extensions, but for a truly new product, a test minimizes the risk of failure, Mr. Weinblatt says.

Still, leading consumer product companies increasingly are bypassing classic testing methods. In 1985, P&G placed Folgers instant decaffeinated coffee crystals into market without in-market testing, as did Pillsbury with Milk Break bars —the company's first snack-bar food. Likewise, Quaker rolled Chewy granola bars and its chocolate-covered Granola Dipps nationally with no conventional market testing.

"Some believe it's best to throw products in the pool and see if they swim. I think it's better to stick a toe in first to see if the product is ready for the pool," Mr. Weinblatt says.

Simulated test marketing won't replace in-market testing completely, Mr. Lukey says. "The cost of a failed national introduction is monumental compared with a failed in-market test," he says.

Test marketing creates a "funnel of expense," says Tina Seber, associate director of Pillsbury's new product technical resources unit, Minneapolis. "It's important to solve problems with a product earlier when expenses are lower," she says. "It's more expensive to generate alternatives [in packaging, media, pricing and other factors] further down in the testing process, when the money being spent has more leverage, and testing those alternatives reduces the risk of failure."

Researchers and marketers will continue searching for ways of further reducing that risk. According to Mr. Lukey, several Burnett clients are collecting data to build their own historical databases and simulated test market systems that will be specific to their product categories.

Product marketers may begin to use test marketing as a way to evaluate rejuvenating existing brands vs. testing new products, as companies begin looking at ways to stimulate sales of maturing brands, he says.

Advertisers say the research industry also still needs to develop systems to test alternative versions of marketing plans in controlled environments and viable, reasonably priced ways to test products in larger metropolitan markets, Pillsbury's Ms. Seber says.

Industry experts anticipate that within the next five years, marketers will be able to satisfy all their test marketing needs in a single place. Joint ventures such as the one between Time Inc.'s Selling Areas-Marketing Inc., Arbitron Ratings Co. and Burke Marketing Services (AA, Jan. 20) not only will foster competition among research companies but also will allow one-stop shopping for services, Quaker's Mr. Blair says.

Burke's joint venture with SAMI and Arbitron will provide both sizable databases and sophisticated predicting services, says John Brown, chairman and chief executive officer of Cincinnati-based Burke. His company will provide demographics; Arbitron will contribute media rating services, and SAMI, sales information from both food and drug stores.

The combination of the three companies also will help reduce the cost of research by allowing more test variables to be run simultaneously, says Reg Rhodes, president of Burke's test marketing group.

Mr. Rhodes agrees that product marketers have been intrigued by the recent flurry of technology. But he believes the focus will shift away from razzle-dazzle and back toward improved information handling for better decision making. "The technology has been in the limelight lately, but we will have to begin looking at how to effectively model the data so behavior is projectable," he says.

ON THE DIAL

Scheduled radio specials and new programs or syndicated services.

Public Interest Affiliates has picked up the syndication rights to Major League Baseball Productions' "This Week in Baseball," a 15-minute recap of the previous week's action in baseball with Mel Allen. The feature was dropped by CBS Radio Network during the offseason. "This Week" will premiere April 11; since PIA signed the deal two weeks ago, more than 40 stations have been signed. Avails are wide open. A new feature, "Baseball Radio Newsatellite," will hit the airwaves on April 7, the day the baseball season officially opens. This feed offers player interviews and features about baseball twice daily to news and sports programers. The morning service offers access to material that can be dropped into local sports reports. The afternoon feed, called "Baseball Today," is a 15-minute feature package that can stand alone. Avails are also wide open. So far, a dozen stations reportedly have signed on.

PETE TOWNSHEND

Pete Townshend, the Who guitarist who's now doing nicely on his own, is the subject of NBC Radio Entertainment's "Legends of Rock" for the weekend of March 14 to 16. Participating advertisers include Anheuser-Busch for Budweiser, other avails open. Closing date is March 3.

David Sanborn's "The Jazz Show" on NBC Radio Entertainment Network has several openings for its March 2 show. Participating advertisers signed so far include Miles Laboratories' Alka-Seltzer Plus, and Levi's 501 Jeans. Closing is Feb. 17.

Paul Shaffer's "Live From the Hard Rock Cafe" has several avails for its March 2 run, with closing Feb. 17. Participating advertisers include Van Munching & Co. for Heineken. ■

TV AVAILS

A weekly listing of tv programming that still has commercial availabilities open in the next few weeks.

"The Real Ghostbusters" now is headed for barter-syndication via Columbia Pictures Television, Burbank, in September, 1987, a year later than planned before NATPE—where the distributor cleared the stripped, 65-episode cartoon series for the after-school daypart on 70 stations (for more than 70% coverage of U.S. tv households). Reason: Columbia, which plans to sell two national minutes on each daily, half-hour episode (leaving four for stations), sold ABC-TV on airing 13 episodes of "Ghostbusters" as a Saturday morning cartoon, as of September.

Access Syndication, Studio City, Cal., has no ad avails through the second quarter for three current weekly bartered series: "Lorne Greene's New Wilderness," now on 152 stations for 74% coverage of U.S. tv homes; "The Exciting World of Speed & Beauty," now on 31 stations (49%), and "Hollywood Close-Up," now on 41 stations (58%).

"Your Choice for the Film Awards," a two-hour special with a March 8 to 23 prime time telecast "window" as a preview of the Academy Awards (airing live on ABC-TV, March 24), is selling 10 national ad minutes via LBS Communications, New York. The show, to be produced March 1 by KHJ-TV, Los Angeles, will have more than 100 carrier stations cleared by March, for at least 74% coverage of U.S. tv homes. ■

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decidedly a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

'60 Minutes' lead slips

"60 Minutes" has yet to recover from the fatal matchup with "Super Bowl XX" in which the show lost by more than 20 share points. The show is down several points from its unsual overwhelming dominance at 7 p.m. (ET).

An extremely tight ratings race ushered in the February sweeps on Feb. 2. Audiences were torn between James Bond (ABC's "Octopussy"), a Machiavellian Joan Collins (CBS' "Sins") and a Czarist Maximillian Schell (NBC's "Peter the Great"). "Sins" finally conquered its competition, albeit by slim margins.

"Peter" lost its final two nights by six share points to "Sins." En route to victory, the CBS miniseries also swamped ABC's thus far stable "Moonlighting."

"Peter" also took valuable shares out of ABC's hide: When "Sins" went off, some of the audience went over to NBC to see what all the fuss was about. The NBC miniseries picked up an extra share point its last evening while nearly sending "Dynasty" to its first loss of the season.

ABC had other reasons to cheer. Both "Webster" and "Mr. Belvedere" scored convincing victories against "Misfits of Science" and "Airwolf." For the first time in weeks, neither CBS nor NBC threw one-time-only specials against the comedy duo. NBC also had good numbers for its premiere of "Disney Sunday Movie." The movie got a 23 share, which bettered NBC's early evening performance on Feb. 2. ■

Last week's Tylenol poisoning poses another threat to Johnson & Johnson's best-selling pain reliever and raises questions as to the effectiveness of another campaign similar to the coupon ads used after the 1982 poisonings.

2-time loser

Ibuprofen to gain from Tylenol plight

An Advertising Age roundup

Cyanide most likely will not be the death of Johnson & Johnson's $525 million Tylenol brand, but the latest tampering incident probably will have more serious marketing repercussions than the first episode in 1982, when seven Chicagoans died after ingesting tainted Tylenol capsules.

Drug-industry analysts question whether J&J, burned twice, will continue marketing Tylenol capsules.

The discovery of cyanide in two bottles of Extra Strength Tylenol in a New York City suburb could not have come at a worse time for J&J. American Home Products' Advil, which contains ibuprofen, last month became the second biggest-selling pain reliever in the U.S. Analysts believe that, if marketed properly, Advil and Bristol-Myers' Nuprin can make further inroads on Tylenol's 34% share of the over-the-counter pain remedy market.

Tylenol, with 1985 sales of $525 million, still holds a considerable

Ad-cost tax deduction may face cut of 20%

By STEVEN W. COLFORD

WASHINGTON—A multi-billion-dollar change in the federal tax treatment of advertising expenditures is on a list of revenue-raising ideas sent to the Senate finance committee by the Treasury Department.

The department list includes making only 80% of ad costs deductible from federal corporate income tax as a "business expense," instead of the current 100%.

Treasury officials would not elaborate on the proposal last week, although the department estimated the tax change would raise $20.6 billion in new corporate income taxes from advertisers over a five-year period. A Treasury official characterized the list as "options" that don't necessarily represent Reagan administration policy.

U.S. ad spending in 1986 is projected to exceed $109 billion for the first time, according to Robert Coen, senior vp-director of forecasting at McCann-Erickson, New York (AA, Dec. 16).

Congress and President Reagan are trying to agree on a formula that would balance new tax breaks with selected revenue-raising measures elsewhere.

The proposal caught ad-industry leaders by surprise.

"Ronald Reagan says there'll be no tax increase, but another way to have one is to change the [tax] situation so companies pay more in taxes," said Howard Bell, president of the American Advertising Federation. "This is a tax increase in another name."

At the Assn. of National Advertisers, senior vp Dan Jaffe said reducing tax deductions for advertisers would be "counterproductive because it's then likely that advertisers would spend less and there would be less sales, less tax revenue, slower job creation and [so on] down the line."

"If it's a serious consideration," Mr. Jaffe said, "business would be very opposed."

The proposed $20.6 billion revenue gain over five years is surpassed by only a few other options on the Treasury Department's list, such as a 10% disallowance of business interest deductions, a 10% disallowance for corporate interest deductions and changes in the business transfer tax.

By comparison, a 20% disallowance on corporate ad expenses could bring in nearly half as much as the much-discussed oil-import fee, according to Treasury Department calculations.

Chiat, BBDO in shootout for U.S. Apple account

By CLEVELAND HORTON

Apple Computer has set up a showdown between longtime agency Chiat/Day and BBDO for the $50 million U.S. Apple account.

BBDO handles most of Apple's overseas advertising and has been reported to be wooing the company for the plum U.S. assignment for quite some time (AA, Aug. 5).

Cupertino, Cal.-based Apple said it is reevaluating its entire domestic marketing strategy.

The No. 2 personal computer marketer in the U.S. has asked Chiat and BBDO to submit detailed market strategies for "the foreseeable future" within 60 days, according to Bruce Mowery, advertising and sales promotion manager. He added, "This is not an open review. We are not soliciting any other agencies."

Chiat chairman Jay Chiat said he plans to meet with Apple chairman-ceo John Sculley Feb. 18. Mr. Chiat said Mr. Sculley expressed a "need to make sure he has [agency] people he can have confidence in" as Apple gears up for a new generation of product introductions. The outcome of that meeting may determine whether C/D will compete with BBDO for the account.

Apple will celebrate its 10th anniversary in 1987, and Mr. Sculley wants to position the company as being on "the crest of another revolution" in its advertising next year, Mr. Chiat said. Apple endured a wrenching reorganization in 1985 and has devoted

Magazines cut rates, get multiyear deals

GM's '14 points' jab books

By JESSE SNYDER and EDWARD LAPHAM

General Motors' Media Council is wringing bigger ad discounts from many magazines while locking itself into multiyear contracts and promising more pages over the long haul.

But the GM media juggernaut, designed to pare costs for the auto maker, is meeting resistance from some quarters—most notably the Wall Street Journal.

"GM just wants control of the media," complained Journal vp-marketing Bernard Flanagan. "If GM succeeds in making print buying a commodity, it just cheapens editorial content of a medium and leads to its ultimate death for lack of content. It's counterproductive in the long run."

With relatively light GM business, the Journal has so far spurned the company's efforts to write new ground rules for media buying.

Not all publications are balking, however.

And GM's desire to entertain "multiyear proposals," one of its highly publicized "14 points" (AA, July 8), may be the balm that soothes the pain of rate cuts for some magazines.

Publishing "is a cyclical busi-

Air battle for Northwest's account

ST. PAUL, MINN.—Northwest Orient Airlines next month will stage a creative shootout between Grey Advertising, Minneapolis, and Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York. The winner gets "all or part of" the combined U.S. account for Northwest and Minneapolis-based Republic Airlines, pending approval of their merger (AA, Jan. 27). DFS now has Republic's $25 million account. Grey handles an estimated $35 million in Northwest business, a figure that the carrier expects will "increase significantly" this year. Colle & McVoy, Minneapolis, which handles Northwest's convention business and smaller accounts, wasn't invited to pitch.

Blowup in Baltimore 3

The stormy breakup of partners in Smith Burke & Azzam in Baltimore has spawned a lawsuit in which ousted exec vp Gene Azzam charges the agency with inflating client bills and using media money to improve cash flow. His former partners, in turn, accuse Mr. Azzam of trying to sully the agency's reputation and squeeze more severance pay from them

Humana-izing advertising 3

Humana Inc. next month becomes the first investor-owned multihospital system to launch a tv campaign designed to create a national brand image. But Humana's two closest competitors, Hospital Corp. of America and American Medical International, are preparing to embrace similar strategies as healthcare providers square off in an ever more competitive market.

Stroh tries 'value packs' 4

Stroh Brewery Co. is challenging traditional beer industry discount practices with 15-can and 30-can "value packs" for its Stroh's and Stroh Light brands. The move to value-added discounting will bow in a special March promotion tied to the brewer's participation in the Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island restoration project.

MCI loss prompts Ally questions 6

The loss of the MCI Communications account prompted widespread questioning about Ally & Gargano last week. Wall Street wondered why A&G was caught so much by surprise, while Madison Avenue asked whether the agency would be more open to being acquired.

'House Beautiful' redecorates 32

House Beautiful, the Hearst Magazines home and decorating monthly, targeted to the upper-middle of the market between, roughly, Better Homes & Gardens and Architectural Digest, is making more changes following a year of major shifts that included a new publisher, a new promotion campaign and a series of changes among the business staff.

Toys are plush 53

Bear down, granola bars 4

The $438 million granola-bar market is in a crunch. Developed as a "healthy" alternative to candy a decade ago, granola bars showed enough early potential to interest General Mills, Quaker Oats, Ralston Purina, Hershey, Pillsbury and other major marketers. Yearly growth rates as high as 56% (in 1982) helped boost the category. But those days are gone.

OTHER NEWS

The partners of Fallon McElligott Rice in Minneapolis realized they were in a bind: They felt they had to expand internationally, but they were concerned about the risk even of expanding to New York or Los Angeles. The result was the sale of about 75% ownership of their 4½-year-old agency to Scali, McCabe, Sloves. Page 3.

Granola bars still have their champions, but some marketers are looking instead to the $194 million dried-fruit snack category. Fruit snacks are made from processed dried fruit pressed into bars or flattened on sheets of wax paper for tearing and eating. Dollar sales of fruit snacks hit $194 million in the first 10 months of 1985, up 28.5% compared with the previous year. Page 4.

The persistence of health-conscious consumers is beginning to pay off—both for them and for the marketers of lighter foods and beverages, sporting goods, self-diagnostic tests and a host of other products and services. A study by Langer Associates, New York, suggests the health trend is entering a second phase in which consumers have integrated new health habits and awareness into their life styles. Page 58.

Waterproof quality—in footwear and marinewear—is the umbrella theme behind Timberland Co.'s advertising from its new agency, SSC&B:Lintas Worldwide, New York. The U.S. campaign, themed "All the quality you may ever need," breaks in March issues of national consumer magazines, and will feature the company's footwear. Page 62.

In 1971, a Yale University dropout, a Peace Corps volunteer bitten by the filmmaking bug, Tony Vanderwarker, poured himself into his first feature film: "Gross National Product," a black comedy about the Vietnam War. It was "an abysmally bad film," says Vanderwarker, who turns 43 years old March 6 and can look back at his brief filmmaking "career" from a different perspective. But it also was "a fantastic experience" and a "learning" one, he adds. Coke hoists flag for Classic

By NANCY GIGES

As Coca-Cola USA resumes the flag-waving for its old Coca-Cola Classic favorite, thereby positioning the brand above the Pepsi battle, its troubled new Coke has clearly inherited Classic's "slow down Pepsi" marketplace mission.

To further delineate the separate paths these brands are taking, the newest new Coke campaign—created by McCann-Erickson—has tv spots that pit the newer brand against rival Pepsi-Cola with leading-edge, stylized ads and the Pepsi-generation-type theme "Catch the wave." For Classic, once again settling into its flagship-brand role for the company, SSC&B:Lintas has created a patriotic, old-fashion creative platform

Mr. Iacocca was removed by Donald Hodel, Secretary of the U.S. Department of Interior, from his post on the federal advisory commission because of a "perceived conflict of interest" with his chairmanship of the Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Foundation, according to a

Granola bar market shares

Dried-fruit snacks new hot market

MINNEAPOLIS—Granola bars still have their champions, but some marketers are looking instead to the $194 million dried-fruit snack category. Fruit snacks are made from processed dried fruit pressed into bars or flattened on sheets of wax paper.

General Mills, the granola-market pioneer, is one marketer that appears to be shifting its focus. Its 1985 granola-bar ad spending totaled only $7 million, compared with $15 million for fruit snacks. The company had no comment on its plans.

General Mills' Fruit Corners line already leads the fruit-snack category with an estimated 75% share, followed by Thomas J. Lipton Inc's Sunkist brand with 22% of the market. Private-label brands make up the remainder of the market.

Dollar sales of fruit snacks hit $194 million in the first 10 months of 1985, up 28.5% compared with the previous year, with yearend sales expected to be up more than 38%, according to Time Inc.'s Selling Areas-Marketing Inc. Sales climbed 33.6% to $151 million in 1984 compared with 1983, the segment's first year.

Survivors fight for granola-bar market

By JULIE FRANZ

The $438 million granola-bar market is in a crunch.

Developed as a "healthy" alternative to candy a decade ago, granola bars showed enough early potential to interest General Mills, Quaker Oats, Ralston Purina, Hershey, Pillsbury and other major marketers. Yearly growth rates as high as 56% (in 1982) helped boost the category.

But those days are gone. The granola-bar category grew only 3.5% in dollar sales last year, compared with 1984, and many marketers who leaped into this category are now investing in the smaller but faster-growing dried-fruit snack category (see related story above).

As the dust begins settling in a market that has been so volatile, analysts expect the days of jockeying for position are over. Quaker Oats and General Mills have found success and are expected to hold share. Carnation has flopped on two occasions, Pillsbury is expected to fold its hand by yearend and Ralston Purina is holding its own. Kellogg, which entered the market last year, shows promise, while candy makers Hershey Foods and M&M/Mars are hoping the magic returns.

The same factors that made the granola category explode a few years back have brought growth to a virtual halt, one agency source said. Granola is a grain-based mixture, most often made from wheat and oats, that may contain nuts, fruit, honey or brown sugar. But as granola-bar makers added sweet things for taste, the line between granola bars and candy bars began blurring.

Candy-bar marketers now are touting the wholesome aspects of their products ("Snickers satisfies you"), making it even harder to distinguish between the two product categories.

The market leader, Quaker Oats Co., Chicago, with a 50% share, wrested the leadership from General Mills, Minneapolis, in mid-'84. With its start in the market, Quaker added a new dimension to granola-bar advertising by emphasizing its product's taste ("Unexpectedly moist, chewy and delicious," ads said), leaving the "health food" moniker to General Mills' Nature Valley with its "100% natural" theme line.

Quaker followed its $20 million Chewy Granola Bar introduction in 1981 with flavor line extensions, such as peanut butter & chocolate chip and chunky nuts & raisins. Adding chocolate coating for its $24 million, late 1983, introduction of Granola Dipps and peanut butter coating for its $20 million June introduction of Peanut Butter Whipps helped keep the Quaker brand on top.

Backer & Spielvogel Chicago, formerly Quaker's in-house agency, AdCom, handles Chewy Granola Bars while J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, handles Whipps and Dipps.

General Mills' market share continues to drop, falling to a 23% share of the market, down from 28% in 1984, as the company shifts ad dollars to the faster growing fruit-snacks segment.

General Mills is keeping itself alive in granola bars with its recent introduction of Nature Valley Boppers. Much of the $25 million introductory ad budget is going to coupon redemption while the remainder is slated for network tv and print, themed "gone Boppers," via Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago.

The company introduced its chocolate entry, the Dandy bar, early last year. Campbell-Mithun, Minneapolis, handles.

To solidify its lead, Quaker has moved to heavy price discounting and more advertising. On Jan. 26 Quaker Oats dropped a couponed freestanding newspaper insert for its Whipps and Dipps brands offering a free box of either with a purchase of two boxes. The company also is promising retailers strong national tv support, retail grocery buyers say.

Quaker's over-all ad spending hit $20 million in 1985, up from $19 million in 1984, industry sources say.

Stroh challenges usual discounts

By RAYMOND SERAFIN

DETROIT—Stroh Brewery Co. is challenging traditional beer industry discount practices with 15-can and 30-can "value packs" for its Stroh's and Stroh Light brands.

The move to value-added discounting, rather than cents-off promotions, will bow in a special March promotion tied to the brewer's participation in the Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island restoration project.

The 15-pack will be distributed in place of the 12-pack in western markets, while a 30-pack will be offered in place of a 24-can case in the rest of the country.

The offer is scheduled only for March but is likely to return before the end of 1986, said Ray Gross, director-marketing development.

Point-of-purchase displays for the promotion, via Flair Communications, Chicago, will announce that Stroh will make a contribution to the Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Foundation for every pack sold. Stroh's contribution will be 10¢ per pack.

Meanwhile, Stroh's third annual Run for Liberty—held during October the first two years—has been moved up to June 28 to take advantage of the hoopla expected to surround the July 4 dedication of the refurbished statue.

Last year's run, with 120,000 entries, raised $300,000 for the restoration fund. Mr. Gross said this year's run will be held in 110 cities (down from 127), but he expects a better over-all turnout because of better weather and publicity accompanying the July 4 festivities.

The production scramble

Shops making spots abroad

By JACK HAFFERKAMP

Last year, producers at J. Walter Thompson Co. shot a tv spot for Kraft Miracle Whip salad dressing in which a farmer, coming home for lunch after a hot morning in the field, discovered his wife was out of Miracle Whip.

The key scene in the spot is the farmer searching across acres of lush farmland for a neighbor who will lend him his favorite sandwich spread.

But the agency's problem was the lack of production facilities near most U.S. farmland, and the prohibitive expense involved in shipping a production crew and equipment long distances.

As a solution, the spot's director, David Ashwell, an Englishman, suggested London as a location, and JWT discovered it could save 15% to 20% of costs by producing the spot in the U.K.

Increasingly, advertising agencies are scouring the world for inexpensive locations and other ways to save money shooting commercials. According to one agency executive, the pressure is coming from marketers who are unhappy with soaring production costs.

A recent Assn. of National Advertisers study of 15 major companies, four ad agencies and three consultants found that from 1979 to 1984 production costs rose twice as fast as the consumer price index. Among the reasons were increased costs for special effects, preparation costs (up 113%), set construction costs (up 185%), talent costs (up 132%) and props and wardrobe (up 232%).

"The over-all economic difference [of overseas production] is certainly worthwhile, particularly on a really big job," said Barney Melsky, president of New York's Melsky Zander Films.

Although agency execs were reluctant to cite specific figures, they all agreed that shooting overseas can result in substantial savings on crew costs, special effects, sets, props and talent.

Agencies are shooting spots in Canada, France and Spain, but London appears to be the favorite. That's partly because of British directors with a reputation for superior work, such as Ridley Scott, who directed Apple Computer's acclaimed "1984" spot for Chiat/Day.

John Cigarini, president of BFCS, one of Britain's top film production houses, said British directors are held in high esteem because many of them also do feature film work.

He said directors and other members of the film community turned to commercials during the 1970s when the British feature film industry was suffering a decline and fewer films were being produced.

"Consequently, the studios and the construction people and the art departments in England are more geared toward commercials than they are in America," he said.

He also said British directors are different from U.S. directors because the former have more input on commercial projects.

According to Mr. Cigarini, directors in the U.K. have "total involvement in a project, from location scouting, to the casting, to the editing. It's seeing a film all the way through. From all reports I [have] heard, this is something the American agencies had not been receiving from the American directors."

Strength of dollar plays major role

In recent years, the strength of the U.S. dollar versus foreign currencies has also played a major part in making foreign production more attractive.

Even now, as the dollar declines, a comfortable edge remains, according to Martin Levin, a producer at JWT in Chicago who has worked in the U.K. He speculates that the advantage will remain as long as the dollar stays under $2 per pound sterling. In early February, the exchange rate was $1.39 for one pound sterling.

However, it appears that even if the dollar-to-pound exchange rate differential were to evaporate completely, the awareness of foreign production as a creative and economic consideration is not likely to disappear. It is now a basic part of the production formula at top agencies. And while it may not be the primary factor in their considerations, it is certainly on clients' minds, too.

For example, Dennis Byron, director of marketing communications for Data General, describes his thinking this way:

"The determining factor is what you want the ad to accomplish. You can't say, 'I'm going to shoot in central Europe or the Far East,' and then see what they have to offer. You do it the other way around."

According to one source, a client last year asked one of its agencies to look into shooting a commercial outside the U.S., and the agency found that hundreds of thousands of dollars could be saved if the spot were shot overseas. The commercial was shot in the U.S., however, when the client put the agency under a rigid time limit, the source said.

What was astonishing, according to the source, is that production houses outside the U.S. quoted a significantly lower figure for the job even though the director and other elements of the shoot remained unchanged.

According to Mr. Melsky, agencies now must "take a global look at buying, and buy the best, most efficient production wherever they can find it."

U.S. production crews are becoming a common sight in London.

U.K. has best value for dollar

By JOHN O'TOOLE

What does an Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries ministers' meeting have to do with where a New York agency shoots a commercial?

Well, try to follow this: OPEC decisions in December effectively lowered the world price of oil; this reduced the U.K.'s expected income from its North Sea wells; that caused the British pound, which had been reviving since September, to lag again; that made a production job bid in pounds even more attractive than it was the previous week.

Such considerations increasingly occupy the minds of agency producers whose previous concerns about currency fluctuations ended at the price of Gucci loafers. But with clients no longer concealing their outrage at $250,000 bids for 30-second commercials, and with megamergers threatening in-house consolidation of production as well as media buying, agency producers are turning to overseas shooting to convince clients that they are, after all, budget-conscious. And last year they found some real bargains, thanks to the continued strength of the dollar.

It would, they point out, be false economy if the talent were not there to insure a quality product. But if the popularity of British directors such as Barry Meyers and Howard Guard is any indication of foreign proficiency behind the camera, it's there in abundance.

Phil Dusenberry of BBDO, in fact, claims that the genius of certain directors and not the feebleness of the pound attracts him to London studios. He even shot a Pepsi commercial there with director Ridley Scott that had to do with an American space ship launch.

While they can get the quality they seek on film working elsewhere, most producers opt to finish back home. The sophisticated equipment and technical talent required for computerized editing on videotape is, for the moment, in America.

This, however, is where the savings from shooting overseas can be wiped out. Some sophisticated technical equipment commands rental charges of up to $800 an hour.

But for the alert producer, overseas filming can bring many commercials in substantially below what they would cost in the U.S. One obvious area of saving is on-camera talent costs, a topic that sends blood pressures soaring at the headquarters of the Screen Actors Guild.

The union now has reciprocity with its counterpart in the U.K. and insists there be a "legitimate reason" for using non-SAG performers in other foreign productions. Nevertheless, one can honor their rules and still save plenty by "buying out" the talent with a single payment in lieu of residuals and by avoiding the overscale rates that are becoming all too common in the U.S.

British crews eliminate 'golden time'

Several American producers claim that a more cooperative attitude about the clock on the part of European crews also results in savings. Stretching the normal working day a bit under abnormal circumstances can obviate "golden time" or an additional day of shooting.

Another potential saving is in director's fees. These have soared in recent years, particularly among the "name" directors who charge $10,000 to $15,000 per shooting day and half that for a day of preparation.

Will they work for less in the U.K. and Europe? "Of course they will," says Barry Day of McCann-Erickson. American directors want to establish themselves in the growing centers of commercial production outside the U.S. and British directors enjoy the London tradition whereby they run the show with little interference from the agency producer.

But the most substantial saving results from the powerful U.S. dollar. Just as it makes clothing and shoes less expensive than they were three years ago in Europe, it makes raw film stock and stage rentals and wardrobes less expensive. Wages for electricians and cameramen and grips are calculated in currencies that translate into fewer dollars.

And despite the moderate success leading Western governments achieved in taming the dollar recently, smart shoppers can find a bargain, whether it's in Burberry raincoats or 30-second tv commercials. One New York producer told me she could bring a London production in well under the bid from a U.S. production house for the same commercial even after adding $20,000 in travel and living expenses for agency and client personnel.

The most popular countries for bargain filming just happen to be among the most popular for bargain vacationing. There's England, offering a variety of the "hot" directors. There's France with the scenic Paris locations. There's Italy where the superb facilities of Cinecitta Studios are located and there's Spain where the technicians who produced Sergio Leone's "spaghetti westerns" work along the Mediterranean coast.

And therein lies the problem. As Ogilvy & Mather's Jay Schulberg points out, no matter how much the agency is saving the client by filming overseas, there's no way to recommend a trip to London, Paris, Rome or the Costa del Sol without being accused of boondoggling.

Mr. O'Toole, former chairman of Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, New York, writes a monthly column on creativity for the International section of Advertising Age.

market—a market they consider a natural extension of candy—with products of their own.

Hershey, Pa.-based Hershey Foods was the first traditional candy maker to get into the granola action with its 1983 introduction of New Trail bars. Hershey New Trail bars have made little headway, despite the product's acclaimed campaign via Ogilvy & Mather, New York, which features children doo-wopping to '50s and '60s music that describes the product's taste.

To bolster sales, Hershey added chocolate-covered granola to its New Trail line of granola bars in January. It will be offered in three flavors: Honey graham, peanut butter and cocoa creme.

Hackettstown, N.J.-based candy giant M&M/Mars in April will introduce Kudos, a milk-chocolate covered granola bar, in Northeast markets after denying rumors of such a move for more than a year. The product comes in three flavors: Nutty fudge, peanut butter and chocolate chip.

Ad support, probably breaking this summer, calls for tv and magazines, via Ted Bates Advertising/-New York.

Rather than going head-to-head with granola-bar makers, M&M/-Mars said Kudos should broaden its interest in the snack category since research shows growing interest among consumers for high-quality snacks. Chocolate lovers eat both chocolate and chocolate-covered granola, Mars has found. "They eat both, and a lot of it," said a company spokesman.

Rounding out the granola-bar segment, Ralston Purina, St. Louis, holds the No. 3 spot with a 7% share, followed by Los Angeles-based Carnation's Breakfast Bars with 6%, Kellogg Co.'s Rice Krispies Bars with 5% and Hershey's New Trail with 4% (down from 7% in 1984).

Ralston has been leaning heavily on its S'Mores Granola Bars' campfire tradition in $5 million in print ads via MCA Advertising, New York. The impact of the mid-'84 introduction was diluted when Quaker quickly introduced a S'mores flavor of its Chewy granola bars. The Quaker product received newspaper couponing and tv spots separate from the brand's over-all campaign.

Carnation Breakfast Bars, on the market since 1975, are a vitamin-fortified product that, combined with a glass of milk, offer a well balanced meal, the company says. SSC&B, New York, handles the estimated $2 million account.

Carnation had made two other ill-fated forays into the category, first with Good & Chewy Bars, which tested in 1984 but "never got off the ground," the company said. Carnation Trail Mix Bars bowed in 1982 but were discontinued in 1983 after a reformulation failed to revive sales.

Battle Creek, Mich.-based Kellogg entered the fray with its Rice Krispies Bars in April. Kellogg has forged inroads in its initial eastern and southern introductory markets as the product moves national, sources say. Rice Krispies Bars has grabbed as high as a 20% share in some of its markets with an average of a 13% among all its markets, Kellogg says.

Network tv and couponing, via Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, which broke nationally in mid-September, stress the unique taste and texture of the three-flavor line of bars made with Kellogg's Rice Krispies cereal. The product's theme line, "Kellogg's Rice Krispies cereal provides the crispy and the oats and honey provide the chewy," leans heavily on reputation of its No. 4-selling cereal.

Minneapolis-based Pillsbury's Milk Break Bars, introduced in April, 1984, aren't selling enough to register on data tracked by Time Inc.'s Selling Areas-Marketing Inc. The company has dropped advertising support and dumped two of its four flavors, Pillsbury said. Ketchum Advertising/San Francisco, handled.#

Roll-Ups in West Coast markets, looking to head off possible encroachment by Lipton or any new entries. A new spot from Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago, sticks to the product's "fun" theme, featuring a school bus full of monkeys dressed as children. It shows the monkeys ripping apart packages of Fruit Roll-Ups, playing with them and, of course, eating them. Sources say General Mills plans to begin running the spot nationally during the first quarter. Previous spots for the product featured children in similar situations.

Creative for General Mills' Fruit Corners Fruit Bars exploits the fact the product is both "good and ugly." Needham also handles.

General Mills' share in this segment has been growing at the expense of Lipton. But that trend was halted by Lipton's introduction last summer of Sunkist Fun Fruits, a pellet-shape fruit product that has helped expand the company's franchise and the category without taking share from General Mills, industry analysts say.

The four-flavor Fun Fruits line is targeted more toward children—the market's high-growth segment—than Lipton's first product, Sunkist Fruit Rolls. Fun Fruits' theme line, "Every chewy one is real fruit fun," echoes General Mills' Fruit Corners Fruit Roll-Ups theme, "Real fruit and fun rolled up in one." Foote, Cone & Belding, New York, handles Sunkist.

Englewood Cliffs, N.J.-based Lipton entered the market in 1980 by acquiring Chicago-based Flavor Tree Inc. Lipton still sells Flavor Tree's single-serving fruit snacks through grocery stores. Rumrill-Hoyt, New York, handles.

Lipton's first entry under its Sunkist label was Fruit Rolls, introduced in 1983. Tv and print, themed "Have you heard your fruit today?" features noises made when the fruit is ripped from its paper wrapper.

Rapid sales growth in the fruit-snack segment should attract new entries to the market, sparking yet another spurt of sales, one source said. The high cost of entry may hold back new brands, however. Other snack makers (such as Quaker Oats) or other fruit-product marketers (such as General Food's Jell-O or Castle & Cooke's Dole) are most likely to take a stab at the market, the source added.

Experts question the long-term growth potential of fruit snacks. Because the product is targeted primarily to children, its market size is smaller than that for granola bars, aimed at all ages.

Sales volume will begin slowing at $200 million and will peak at $250 million, said Alan Miller, SAMI vp-sales service. Growth is potentially greater, but rests on the popularity of dried fruit sold in grocery and health-food stores. Raisins, the most popular dried fruit, have had three good drying seasons. A crop failure would "shove fruit-bar sales through the roof," Mr. Miller said.#

Timberland campaign leakproof

HAMPTON, N.H.—Waterproof quality—in footwear and marinewear—is the umbrella theme behind Timberland Co.'s advertising from its new agency, SSC&B:Lintas Worldwide, New York.

The U.S. campaign, themed "All the quality you may ever need," breaks in March issues of national consumer magazines (AA, Feb. 10), and will feature the company's footwear. Later, said Timberland marketing vp John Thorbeck, the theme will cover Timberland's marine apparel from its Sag Harbor, N.Y., subsidiary, Atlantis.

The theme may travel well, too: SSC&B:Lintas exec vp Robert Wadsworth said other SSC&B offices in Europe were impressed with the campaign, and may use its American wording in European ads to lend a high-quality tone to the goods.

Not that Europeans will have to be educated about the Timberland name. Of the company's $70 million in sales last year, nearly 25% came from overseas, particularly in Italy, where Timberland is considered trendy, Mr. Thorbeck said. This year, Timberland is aiming for $100 million—or "Point-one billion," as Mr. Thorbeck insists—in sales, while increasing foreign sales to 30% of that total.

Ad spending this year also has taken off. From $1.7 million media spending while the account was at Ally & Gargano, New York, last year, the budget grew to $4 million domestically, and from $750,000 in Europe to $2 million this year.

Needham's Vanderwarker

In 1971, a Yale University dropout, a Peace Corps volunteer bitten by the filmmaking bug, Tony Vanderwarker, poured himself into his first feature film: "Gross National Product," a black comedy about the Vietnam War. It was "an abysmally bad film," says Vanderwarker, who turns 43 years old March 6 and can look back at his brief filmmaking "career" from a different perspective. But it also was "a fantastic experience" and a "learning" one, he adds. More than that, it was a step on the way to exec vp-director of creative services at Needham Harper Worldwide's New York division, a position to which he was named by the agency last fall. See Page 4.

Disney days

Tinkerbell was just a twinkle in Walt Disney's eye when he handed the project to Marc Davis. With a stroke of the pen he used to sketch life into Cinderella, Snow White and the rest of Disney's female animated characters, Mr. Davis gave the fairy the qualities to endear her to countless Disney fans. Tinkerbell became famous. Marc Davis didn't. But his impact on the childhoods of countless Americans is certain. See Page 32.

Sony taps McCann

Park Ridge, N.J.—Sony Corp. of America has consolidated its entire $20 million-plus consumer products account at McCann-Erickson, New York. McCann picks up from Lowe Marschalk an estimated $10 million in billings for Sony videocassette recorders, 8mm video cameras and videocassettes. The gain follows McCann's loss last week of an estimated $40 million worth of Eastman Kodak Co. billings, including Kodak's consumer electronics business (AA, Feb. 17).

Ritz may go national

Tampa, Fla.—R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. will likely move its Ritz cigaret brand into national distribution this year, J. Tylee Wilson, chairman-ceo of parent R.J. Reynolds Industries, Winston-Salem, N.C., said here this week at a meeting of stock market analysts. Ritz, billed as the nation's first designer cigaret, carries the Yves St. Laurent signature on packaging and the cigaret. It has been in test in Atlanta, Oklahoma City, Memphis, St. Louis and the state of Washington since early last year, with the cigaret selling at a premium price in two of those markets. Leber Katz Partners, New York, handles.

Brynner spot hits smoking

New York—The American Cancer Society on Feb. 19 released a new antismoking tv public service spot featuring videoclips of the late Yul Brynner commenting on cigaret smoking. Mr. Brynner says in it: "I really wanted to make a commercial when I discovered that I was that sick and my time was so limited—and to make a commercial that says simply, 'Now that I'm gone, I tell you: Don't smoke, whatever you do, just don't smoke.'" Mr. Brynner died of lung cancer last October. The psa is taken from an interview on ABC's "Good Morning America." McCaffrey & McCall created the spot.

Interpublic profits pop

New York—Interpublic Group of Cos. reported a net income gain of 41% to $14.2 million in the fourth quarter as revenues rose 13% to $206.4 million. For the full year, net income climbed 12% to $36.6 million while revenues rose 7% to $691.5 million.

Disc jockeys such as New York's Howard Stern have used outrageous, often tasteless humor to win audience. Is insult humor still a strong radio format? Do you worry about clients being in a show that holds nothing sacred?

Bill Hansell, vp-associate director of local broadcast, BBDO, New York: "Yes, I do believe 'insult radio' is still viable and will continue to be at least in the near-term. It's popular among a certain younger 'yuppie' audience. If the audience is involved, as I believe Howard Stern's audience is, then that can carry over to the advertiser in a positive sense. At the same time, I'd be selective in my choice of clients, and most particularly the choice of copy that I would run in that kind or type of program. I'd be careful."

B. HANSELL

Deborah Cover-Lewis, vp-media director, Needham Harper Worldwide, Washington: "We're always concerned about the environment in which our clients' commercials run. However, we don't have a blanket policy on not using certain station formats. It depends on the clients' needs. Some clients don't shy away from controversy. Insult humor is not the only format that we monitor closely. I think that insult humor will run its cycle and fade from the forefront just as other radio formats have in the past."

Joel Kushins, senior vp-media director, Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, New York: "It's kind of a lot of fun to listen to some of these shows and a great deal of worry when your advertising is attached to them. In the end, it's much the same situation as with the purchase of a tv program or magazine. You're purchasing an environment. You have to appreciate the separation of church and state. But when it goes one step over the line, it's within our purview not to participate."

J. KUSHINS

J. MENDELSOHN

Jordin Mendelsohn, principal-creative director, Mendelsohn/Zien, Los Angeles: "Your product has to fit that format. I wouldn't do it if I was advertising the Vatican. The key is listeners understand that [the deejay] is kidding. They don't think it's tasteless; they think it's funny. If all radio personalities used that kind of humor, it wouldn't work. [But] because it's unique, it's breaking through the clutter. When you're on the edge, you're always going to upset some people, but it sells a lot of product."

Fred Wray, senior vp-media director, Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago: "Based on what I've heard, it's becoming more popular. From my personal standpoint, to a degree it's funny, but there's a line of taste that's often exceeded. It can be a scary thing to put a commercial message next to a disc jockey who might say anything. Many times when I've listened to those programs I've shuddered to think what it would be like if one of my client's messages was right up next to some of those things they say."

F. WRAY

Marketers treat consumers to new products

By Laurie Freeman

A search for the Fountain of Youth today might take 16th century explorer Ponce de Leon to the corner drugstore instead of Florida.

Skincare and treatment to maintain a youthful complexion is where the action is in the cosmetics and toiletries industry, observers say.

"The industry is moving toward producing more therapeutic products, particularly those products that address individual facial areas, like the undereye," says Allan Mottus, president of Mottus & Associates, New York, a cosmetics industry consultancy.

In 1984, the total skincare preparation market, which includes facial creams, powders and suncare lotions, was $2.3 billion, a 9.5% increase from the previous year, says Susan Babinsky, consultant with Charles Kline & Co., Fairfield, N.J.

Sales of treatment products, such as toners, fade creams and astringents, for women in 1984 increased to $1.1 billion, up 7.3% from 1983, she says. The men's segment of the treatment category showed the largest increase, climbing 15% to $16.7 million in 1984.

Fragrances for women kept pace with the interest in skincare, up 9.3% to $1.53 billion from 1984, according to Kline. Men's fragrances also showed growth, rising 9% to $665 million from the previous year.

In addition to increased sales, fragrances in 1984 took a decidedly patriotic twist. "For the first time in recent memory, the best-selling fragrances in department stores are all American," Mr. Mottus says. Giorgio, Calvin Klein's Obsession and Estee Lauder's Beautiful and White Linen are all home-grown, Mr. Mottus says.

In the mass-merchandise segment, Vanderbilt and Charles of the Ritz' Forever Krystal remain the leading fragrances, while men prefer Stetson by Coty and Ralph Lauren's Chaps, "the western, yet not macho, scents," he says.

Marketers treat consumers

Despite the sweet smell of increased sales in the fragrance category, the skincare segment of the industry remains the focal point. Hundreds of anti-aging skincare products, ranging from moisturizers to eye creams, crowd store counters. There's a product for virtually every wrinkle and every price point.

At the high-end, there's Glycel, a $75-per-ounce skin cream formulated by noted heart surgeon Christiaan Barnard and marketed by New York-based Alfin Fragrances, while at the low end, Richardson-Vicks' best-selling Oil of Olay lotion remains priced at less than $5 for a 3.5-oz. bottle.

Complex, multistep skincare regimens are a fixture at department store cosmetics counters. But some marketers believe these regimens can intimidate the average consumer. Estee Lauder's Prescriptives subsidiary has developed a simpler system, with single, stand-alone treatment and makeup products. "The products can work as a regimen, but we don't push that aspect," says Marianne Diorio, Prescriptives spokeswoman.

"Contemporary working women don't want to commit the time or money it takes to use a regimen," she says. "By the time they're in their 30s, they're ready for serious skincare, they're not satisfied with what they used in college, yet they want a single product that will solve a particular problem."

Prescriptives newest stand-alone product, Flight Cream, was introduced earlier this month through print ads in United Airlines' in-flight magazines. The product is a sky-blue, lightweight, facial cream, designed to counteract temporary conditions of low humidity, stale air and lack of adequate rest, resulting from air travel or working all night, Ms. Diorio says.

To keep pace with increased new product activity such as this, beauty aids marketers have stepped up advertising, leading to conflicting ads and product claims of reaching perfection, industry analysts say.

"They'd like to believe a lot of what's said. They're looking for streamlined regimens that are problem and solution oriented."

To resolve the confusion, women turn to cosmetic counter consultants to recommend the best routine and products for their skin.

This use of consultants, combined with the increased new beauty aids product activity in department stores, has raised industry speculation that the market is splitting into distinct halves, with skincare purchases made at department stores and makeup purchased at drugstores and mass retail outlets.

"The feeling is, if you start when you're young, you'll look better, with less wrinkling. Women aren't taking this as gospel, most don't read the scientific claims. However, they're in love with the idea that anti-aging properties have been proven," an industry source says.

"Women are confused by the claims being made," says Lee MacCallum, senior beauty editor for Glamour magazine.

Cosmetic purchases are rising in mass market outlets because young women now are more comfortable with makeup and they experiment more with it, says analyst Suzanne Grayson, Grayson Associates, Santa Barbara, Cal. In 1984, cosmetics sales were $1.8 billion, a 9.1% increase from the previous year, according to Kline.

"Women who once used 'the no-makeup look' are now in their mid-30s. They're career women, and they're using makeup," she says. "These career women don't have time for department stores, [instead] they're buying their makeup where they buy other personal needs."

Most marketers of prestige label and mass-merchandise brands disagree with analysts' assessment of the market.

"There have always been three groups of consumers. At the top are women who will spend any amount of money to try everything. At the bottom are those who believe it's all the same and go on using Vaseline Intensive Care," one marketer says.

"Most women are in the middle category. They won't pay $50 for a jar of skin cream, but they will pay for Oil of Olay or [Revlon's] European Collegen Complex."

Although figures are not available, many in the industry agree that drugstores and other mass merchandise outlets are playing an increasing role in sales. As their makeup counters attract more business, some drugstores have undergone extensive face-lifts, adding cosmeticians, in-store demonstrations and an upgraded product mix—all traditional department store tactics.

Marketers also are targeting new audiences for rejuvenated business. At its core, the cosmetics industry remains a fashion-oriented, youth-centered business, and the majority of its customers are women.

But because of shifting demographics, primarily slower population growth and an aging population, marketers are reaching out toward potentially lucrative new markets, men and older adults.

The drive for new customers makes economic sense in what is essentially a mature business, reflected in the relatively stable market positions of the major cosmetic companies. In department store sales of skincare and cosmetics, Estee Lauder and its Clinique subsidiary combined are No. 1. Tied for the No. 2 spot are Elizabeth Arden and Revlon's Ultima II line, with Cosmair's Lancome at No. 3.

At the mass market level, for skincare only, Richardson-Vicks' Oil of Olay is on top, followed by Noxell and Revlon.

Revlon's strong showing at the department store and mass market levels is partly because of its segmentation marketing strategy.

The company has divided the market into four categories. Its inexpensive Natural Wonder line is aimed at younger women; the medium-price Revlon line is for their older sisters; Ultima II is Revlon's department store line, including skincare and cosmetics, while the Princess Marcella Borghese skincare and cosmetics line is intended for affluent customers.

But regardless of income level, women want quality products and services, according to Glamour magazine. In its January issue, the magazine offered "The best bargains, treats & bonuses for a beautiful '86," which included dollars-off coupons for cosmetics, body products, fragrance and exercise values from stores and boutiques nationwide.

"No matter if it's skincare or makeup, women are looking for value, quality at the best price," Glamour's Ms. MacCallum says.

In this quest, consumers are presented with skincare and makeup marketers who seek to make their products stand out. As one industry source says, "We're all trying hard to become something special, not just another pretty face."

Sales jump in black and ethnic category

It's a well-kept industry secret, but black and ethnic toiletries and beauty aids has become the one of the faster growing categories in the industry.

In 1984, sales of ethnic toiletries and beauty aids totaled $2.3 billion at the retail level, up about 15% from 1983, according to Chicago-based American Health & Beauty Aids Institute. More than $230 million was spent on ethnic cosmetics, while $299 million went toward ethnic fragrance purchases. Haircare, the largest category, accounted for 41%, or $943 million, of the market.

"The category itself is growing 10% to 15% annually due to better education and understanding on the part of retailers when it comes to stocking ethnic products," says Lafayette Jones, president of AHBAI.

"The black consumer will buy more ethnic beauty care products than any other product," he says. "But if a retailer doesn't carry an adequate inventory—and the competition down the street does—he'll lose that customer because she'll take all her business there."

Retailers should not confine their ethnic toiletries and beauty aids departments solely to black neighborhoods. Stores located in high-traffic business areas could benefit from carrying beauty aids products targeting black women, because as little as 5% of black consumer foot traffic will more than pay its own way, Mr. Jones says.

Several challenges face companies marketing products to the black and ethnic communities.

For example, many retailers still believe the myth that blacks have all the same color shading, Mr. Jones says. "There are more than 33 shades, ranging from ivory white to blue-black. Part of the problem was pure ignorance, but now retailers appear to be willing to learn."

Haircare products, such as Color Play from Clairol, accounted for $943 million in 1984 ethnic toiletries and beauty aids sales.

Fifty-five per cent of all ethnic beauty purchases are made in department stores, slightly higher than the industry average of 40%, according to an industry analyst. Consumers may rely more on the advice of a druggist, because many black hair preparations generally perform a different function than those for whites. Blacks tend to rely more on cosmeticians in department stores or chain drugstores when buying cosmetics or fragrances, primarily to ensure proper skin and color matching, Mr. Jones says.

Given the choice, black women prefer to buy ethnic products over standard makeup offerings, but can't find them in the limited product lines stocked by most retailers, according to Business Trend Analysts, a New York-based research company.

"Most black women want to come into a store and find a large selection of cosmetic shades to choose from. Most times, that isn't the case," says one midwestern chain drugstore buyer.

Retailers will have to change their inventories to meet the growing demand for these products, a BTA spokesperson says. By 1993, the ethnic cosmetics market alone is expected to top the $799.7 million mark. —Laurie Freeman

Scheduled radio specials and new programs or syndicated services.

Satellite Music Network has big plans for the weekend of March 22 with four of its networks pumping out 48-hour specials into the homes of demographically diffuse Americans. All have ad slots open. The Country Coast to Coast Network features a Country Super Gold Weekend, a frolic through the biggest country hits of all time, separated by interviews with a host of country music stars. Cleared by 206 stations. The Star Station Network features a Motown Weekend, with the best from the heyday of Berry Gordy and Motor City music. Cleared by 200 stations. The Stardust Network will run a weekendlong "Stardust Goes to War" special featuring the music of World War II. Cleared by 100 stations. And the Heart & Soul Network features a 48-hour tribute to Marvin Gaye. Cleared by 20 stations.

NBC Radio Entertainment's "Live Album Party" for Feb. 27 will feature Peter Frampton, the former lead guitarist for the rock group Humble Pie whose "Frampton Comes Alive" album of the late '70s made him a solo superstar. Frampton will introduce cuts from his new effort, "Premonition," his first album in several years. Closing is today (Feb. 20). Participating advertisers include Levi's 501 Jeans, Agree shampoo, and Schoenling Little Kings beer.

ABC Radio Networks kicks off a new series, "Music of America," with a concert featuring the Oak Ridge Boys and The Judds to be taped live at Radio City Music Hall March 21. Produced by Kaminsky & Company, the first MOA is set to air in early April on more than 200 stations. Frito-Lay is the first advertiser.

Westwood One network teams up with Showtime March 14 for a simulcast of John Lennon's 1972 concert at New York's Madison Square Garden. Entitled "John Lennon: Live in New York City," a 15-minute interview with Yoko Ono precedes the special. More than 150 stations have cleared the special; sponsors include Sony Corp. and Stroh Brewery Co. ■

TV AVAILS

A weekly listing of tv programming with commercial availabilities open in the next few weeks.

"Home Sweet Home," a half-hour tv special that will air during American Home Week (April 13 to 20), has five avails left for $15,000 to $25,000. Cost depends on the commercial's placement within the show and whether the advertiser wants a national or regional buy. Sarkett Productions, Chicago, handles sales for the show, which is going into its third year. Narrated by Money's Marshall Loeb and Kathie Lee Johnson, "Home Sweet Home" gives advice on home finance and repairs. Sarkett expects to clear the show in prime time access in 100 markets by airdate. The National Assn. of Realtors and Clorox Co. have bought a total of seven units.

"The Best of You," a new beauty "makeover" show from All American TV that lets advertisers demonstrate their products on the air, has started clearing stations for a fall, 1986 start. The series has been running on Canadian tv since 1984 as "The New You." Unit costs will range from $3,500 to $5,000 per 30-second unit on the show, which is projected to get a 2.0 rating in 70% of all U.S. tv households. The half-hour daytime strip is designed for a morning time period.

"Fridays," also from All American, is seeking a 60% clearance level for its April start-date and $10,000 per 30-second unit. All American is projecting a 3.0 national rating for the half-hour program, which originally ran late-night on ABC-TV in 1982. All American's "America's Top Ten" is sold out until September but has September avails for $10,000 to $15,000. The show averages a 3.0 to a 3.5 rating on 112 U.S. tv stations. ■

TV POWER SHARES

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decidedly a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

ABC, NBC Oz-tracized

Saturday Night at the Fights, network style, had an interesting round last week as little Dorothy from Kansas ("The Wizard of Oz") demolished just about everything in her golden-brick path. Even "Golden Girls" and "227" were sent to the canvas.

In the end, NBC prevailed by the skin of its teeth. "Wizard" has aired on CBS umpteen times, but the staying power of the classic is awesome. ABC must have been stunned because the premiere of "Fortune Dane," its midseason replacement, could find no audience.

ABC is looking for a teen audience to counterpunch the "Golden Girls/227" bloc. Good luck. Teen agers and their parents spent Saturday night with CBS.

More good news for CBS: Tuesday night, long a treacherous and lonely path for the network, has been effective during the February sweeps. "Sins" won the night last week, and "Vital Signs" got vital ratings.

ABC is still the boss on Tuesdays, though. "Moonlighting" came back strong after a "Sins" thrashing to garner a 3-share-point win. "Who's the Boss" zapped the CBS "Bugs Bunny" special.

(Why does CBS continue to follow up Reagan press briefings with a Bugs cartoon? At what price political commentary?)

NBC finally found a winner with "An Officer and a Gentleman." Until this movie came up roses, the net just hadn't been able to do anything right on Mondays.

Are those flashy ultra-slick promos doing the trick for Hill Street Blues? Suddenly, the dreariest cop show on the air waves has reversed a ratings slide. It got 31 share last week, proving that Knots Landing may still be vulnerable this season. ■

Coke maps entertainment future

By VERNE GAY and CRAIG REISS

The French have a euphemism for American tv programing. Looking for a way to describe its sweetness and lack of cultural nutrients, they call it "Coca-Cola tv."

The French may not have known just how right they were.

Coca-Cola Co.'s entertainment interests, which did not exist before 1982, already are so vast that the Atlanta-based company could emerge this year as the fifth-largest U.S. media company.

And there is nothing to prevent Coca-Cola, through its Coca-Cola Entertainment Business Sector, from eventually becoming the single biggest media concern.

Coca-Cola has the money to purchase just about any media or programing property it desires. According to Coca-Cola figures, the company has a remarkable cash flow of $9 per share. And Coca-Cola says it is willing to debt-finance further growth.

But the sheer size of Coca-Cola's media holdings is only one of the impressive aspects of its entertainment push. The structure of interrelated media companies it is assembling may be the blueprint for the giant and successful media company of the future.

At every turn in the programing distribution chain, Coca-Cola is the supplier, the purchaser, the manufacturer and, in some cases, the go-between. Coca-Cola's entertainment com-

Net tv drops $242M in '85; first since '71

By VERNE GAY

New York—Network tv advertising revenues plummeted by $241.8 million in 1985, the largest single-year drop in the history of television. It is also the first time since 1971, when cigarets were banned from tv, that network tv ad revenues were lower than the previous year.

While the tv networks all year had been saying that revenues could be down because 1984 was an Olympics and election year, an analysis of full-year 1985 network spending compiled by Broadcast Advertiser Reports shows that the biggest spending cutbacks came from non-Olympics advertisers and nonsports advertiser categories, including women's products, headache remedies and coffee.

In addition, several top spenders cut back last year or remained even. AT&T, Johnson & Johnson, Colgate-Palmolive, Coca-Cola and IBM were among the leaders that sliced budgets in 1985.

Total network revenues in 1985 were $8.3 billion, a 3% decline from 1984's $8.5 billion, which was a 21% increase over 1983, BAR reported.

By contrast, national spot tv expenditures last year increased 8% to $4.5 billion, BAR said.

The 1984 network total included

Three principals exit Yankelovich

New York—Yankelovich, Skelly and White are no longer at Yankelovich, Skelly & White.

Parent Saatchi & Saatchi Co. lost the three well known names in the research business as Daniel Yankelovich, Florence Skelly and Arthur White resigned from the company they founded. They plan to start a new company, the nature of which is not known.

Only Ms. Skelly, as president, has been fully active with the research company lately.

It is believed the three signed a no-compete agreement when they sold YS&W to the Reliance Group in 1969. Reliance sold the YS&W Group, which included both Yankelovich and the McBer & Co. market research outfit, to the Saatchis in 1984 for $13.5 million.

There was no comment on the departures from the three or from Saatchi & Saatchi.

YS&W is to be merged with Clancy, Shulman & Associates, a company with $4 million in revenues, founded by two ex-YS&W executives and acquired by Saatchi & Saatchi later in 1984. S&S last

Mac stacks breakfast ads

By SCOTT HUME and BRIAN MORAN

Having spent more than three months and better than $75 million promoting its McD.L.T. sandwich, McDonald's Corp. next month shifts its formidable marketing resources to bolstering its breakfast sales, which now account for nearly 20% of per-unit sales.

In so doing, Big Mac will be targeting a daypart that has proved weak or been neglected for its chief rivals. Burger King Corp.'s focus during the past six months has been its hamburger menu, first with its "reformulated" Whopper campaign last summer and then with the controversial but much-discussed "Find Herb" effort.

Wendy's International only moved its breakfast program systemwide last July and still is struggling to make it efficient and profitable.

Coke entertains growth ideas 1
The French have a euphemism for American tv programing—"Coca-Cola tv." They may not have known how right they were. Coca-Cola Co.'s entertainment interests, which did not exist before 1982, are so vast Coke could emerge this year as the fifth-largest U.S. media company.

Food marketers look ahead 3
After the Year of the Megamerger, major food and beverage marketers see 1986 as a year to: Streamline marketing operations to pave the way for major new-product pushes; divest units that don't fit the master plan, and seek new acquisitions, particularly fill-in businesses.

A taxing proposition 3
The ad industry hopes successes in fighting state ad taxes will convince Congress and the White House not to change the way advertising expenditures are treated as tax deductible.

RJR ready to put on Ritz 4
R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. will roll national with Ritz cigarets, a female-skewed brand billed as the nation's first designer cigaret, beginning April 14. Ritz has been testing in Atlanta, Oklahoma City, Memphis, and Washington state since March, 1985; St. Louis was added later last year. RJR's decision to take Ritz national surprised competitors who believed it had turned in a less-than-spectacular performance.

Fresh ideas spur cookie market 12
Marketers of soft-and-chewy cookies are adding new ingredients to their product mix even though the $558 million category has not matched early expectations. By most accounts, Nabisco Brands is winning the battle of "dual texture" (crispy outside, soft inside) cookies, with Procter & Gamble, Frito-Lay and Keebler lagging behind.

Stan Richards wants an airline account. His Dallas-based The Richards Group used to have an airline, Muse Air. But in June last year it was absorbed by Southwest Airlines. Just before the buyout, Muse founder and chairman Lamar Muse paid Richards a great compliment: If it hadn't been for the work his agency did, Muse said, Southwest would have picked up the near-bankrupt Muse for next to nothing. As it was, the agency's campaign, touting money-back guarantees and free flights to smokers who would not smoke on the plane, increased load factors and operational profits enough that Southwest had to shell out $60 million for Muse.

Coke Peppers 7UP and Pepsi

New York—Coca-Cola Co.'s $470 million decision to be a Pepper, too, moves the noncola soft-drink battle into a more competitive phase at a time when the cola wars couldn't be hotter.

The announcement Feb. 20 that Atlanta-based Coca-Cola reached preliminary agreement to acquire Dr Pepper Co., Dallas, from members of its senior management and Forstmann Little & Co., follows arch-rival PepsiCo's proposed $380 million acquisition of Seven-Up Co. (AA, Jan. 27). If both deals pass Federal Trade Commission muster —a turn of events competitor Royal Crown Cola Co. has blasted —it would mean colas No. 1 and 2 would own the two brands that, with about 7% of the market each, have been jockeying for the title of

Tylenol, rivals hike ad activity

By PAUL L. EDWARDS

New York—Competitors of Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol are wasting no time boosting their advertising and promotional spending in the wake of the market leader's woes over its second tampering incident.

Major headache-remedy marketers are stepping up their ad schedules and pumping up their budgets to the tune of several million dollars, the tv networks said last week.

The competitive push is in stark contrast to the promotional hush that followed the first Tylenol poisoning deaths in September, 1982. Although competitors' advertising did not grind to a halt then, it was lim-

Cal. tax threatens production

California's commercial-production houses could be slapped with a 6.5% sales tax by late April, and producers are in an uproar. The proposed amendment to the state's tax regulations, which must be approved by California's board of equalization, would reclassify producers of commercials, industrial and educational films as retailers subject to sales tax. The added cost would be passed on to advertisers, a move that could cripple the state's commercial-production

ADWATCH

Herb tries hard, but Mac still leads pack

BK ads gaining in consumer recall

By JULIE FRANZ

Burger King's controversial "Herb" campaign continued last month to boost its ad awareness, but there's just no way the McDonald's juggernaut can be kept down for long.

In January, 45.3% of the consumers polled for Advertising Age's adWatch survey named McDonald's advertising first when asked "Of all the fast-food advertising you've seen, heard or read in the past 30 days, which ad first comes to mind?" That represented an increase of 4.4 percentage points from McDonald's December score of 40.9% first mentions, and almost returned it to the 49% garnered in November, before Herb's arrival.

AdWatch is a joint project of Advertising Age and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. Ad awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample of consumers to name ads in a variety of product categories that first come to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

In January, 1,000 adults were questioned by telephone. Under adWatch methodology, an increase or decrease of 2.8 percentage points is considered statistically significant and attributable to more than sample variation.

Burger King last month added 3.1 percentage points to its share of first mentions, putting its January score at 14.9%.

Burger King's contest to find Herb, the unfortunate nerd who's never tried the chain's Whopper, broke during the Super Bowl, after the January adWatch survey had been taken.

That means BK's unlikely spokesman could continue to build awareness for the chain. However, McDonald's still hasn't stopped the media blitz for its McD.L.T. sandwich that it began in November. Big Mac itself unleashed a half dozen new spots for the item during the Super Bowl.

The competition between Herb and the McD.L.T. has hurt No. 3 Wendy's, whose share of first mentions dropped 4.6 percentage points in January to 7.8% of first mentions, or less than half BK's first-mentions share.

Wendy's had been within three percentage points of Burger King in December.

Ad awareness shares remained relatively stable in the soft-drink category, except for one surprise: Pepsi's share of first mentions dropped 5.1 percentage points to 23.5% from 28.6%. The brand's ads remain in second place behind Coke (34.6%).

That drop widens the gap in ad awareness between the No. 1 and No. 2 soft-drink marketers to nearly 10 percentage points. Pepsi had been closing in on Coke's share of first mentions, coming to within five percentage points in December. Coke's share of first mentions had been dropping for several months as the residual

RJR stumps tobacco industry with Ritz plan

Brand goes national in flat market

By WILLIAM F. GLOEDE

R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. will roll national with Ritz cigarets, a female-skewed brand billed as the nation's first designer cigaret, beginning April 14.

Ritz, designed in conjunction with French fashion designer Yves Saint Laurent, carries his YSL logo on packaging and on its filter barrels.

Ritz has been testing in Atlanta, Oklahoma City, Memphis and Washington state since March, 1985 (AA, Jan. 21, '85, et seq.); St. Louis was added later last year. It is available in both regular and menthol styles in 100mm length.

Winston-Salem, N.C.-based RJR's decision to take Ritz national surprised several competitors, who believed it had turned in a less-than-spectacular peformance since tests began.

According to competitive estimates, Ritz had a 0.25% share of market, vs. the 0.4% to 0.5% thought necessary for success. Sources close to Reynolds believe the share attained in test was closer to 0.6%. Reynolds apparently covered the brand's tracks in test in an attempt to throw competitors off.

"We would never go national with a product with a share that low," said a Reynolds spokesman of the competitive estimates.

John C. Maxwell Jr., tobacco industry analyst for Furman Selz Mager Dietz & Birney, New York, said he believes Ritz had to attain at least a 0.4% market share before the decision to take it national.

"We are very encouraged by our test results," said Martin Orlowsky, RJR's exec vp-sales and marketing. "In each of the test markets, smokers told us Ritz is a high-quality product with a superior taste. And smokers from other parts of the country who tried Ritz in the test markets wrote us asking when the brand would be available in their areas."

Despite its jump from test to the national market, Ritz has not had an easy time of it during its year of testing. The owners of the Ritz Hotel in Paris filed a federal trademark infringment suit in February, 1985, that was later settled out of court; terms were not disclosed.

And Ritz was RJR's entry into the upscale, up-price cigaret category, which has become virtually moribund. In two test markets, Memphis and Oklahoma City, Ritz cost roughly 10¢ more a pack than other brands; the premium price was dropped last fall.

Ritz' female-skewed positioning follows an industry trend. Philip Morris late last year took Virginia Slims 120s national, and Lorillard early this year began testing Newport Slim Lights in Hartford, Conn. The activity in the female market reflects the rise in the share of the smoking market attributed to women to about 50%, from 40%.

But women are not the smoke's only target. Mr. Saint Laurent says he is a devoted Ritz smoker; RJR has been shipping the smokes to him in France since the brand was created. Mr. Saint Laurent said, through Reynolds, "Of all my creations, Ritz cigarets occupy a special place, because I live with them."

Leber Katz Partners, New York, handles Ritz; test ads touted Ritz as "The first luxury class cigaret. Created by Yves Saint Laurent." The new advertising, scheduled to break in April and May editions of national magazines, carries a new theme line "Ritz, a celebration of style and taste by Yves Saint Laurent." In both the test and national ads, models are seen in opulent settings, clad in YSL fashions.#

RJR name change

Winston-Salem, N.C.—R.J. Reynolds Industries will change its corporate name to RJR Nabisco under a proposal approved by its board last week.

KFC mulling Oreos as menu addition

Louisville—Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp. says it is looking at the possibility of testing Nabisco's Oreo Big Stuff cookies at its restaurants.

If, as expected, KFC initiates limited in-store testing for the cookies, it would be the first cross-company venture following last year's merger of KFC parent RJR Industries, Winston-Salem, N.C., and Parsippany, N.J.-based Nabisco Brands (AA, June 3, et seq.).

While Oreos could provide an attractive brand-name addition to the KFC menu, it is unlikely they would generate significant additional sales.

Fast-food leader McDonald's Corp.'s McDonaldland cookie line, for example, is estimated to account for perhaps 1% of per-store sales (although with the company's high per-unit sales average, even 1% translates to better than $10,000).

The success of cookie chains such as Mrs. Fields', David's and Famous Amos has not gone unnoticed by the fast-food chains. McDonald's quietly has been testing fresh-baked chocolate chip cookies in an undisclosed location (AA, Nov. 18), using the ovens it added for its breakfast biscuit rollout.

Chains such as Wendy's International, which added ovens for its baked potato line, easily could follow suit.

Under an agreement between Minneapolis-based chains International Dairy Queen and Grandma Gebhard's Cookies, a joint-venture store has opened that sells IDQ's ice cream and Grandma Gebhard's cookies and muffins.

But the most important aspect of the KFC/Oreo test could be RJR's decision to consider the 9,000 KFC restaurants' potential for giving added visibility to the many established brands it controls. Using those stores as sampling sites for new products could be a possibility.#

CATEGORY REVIEW: COLD REMEDIES

Cold remedies score second year running

Tried-and-true efficacy remains as ad route

By PATRICIA WINTERS

New York—The big winners in this year's battle in the $800 million cold-remedy market continue to be established brands, such as Richardson-Vicks' NyQuil, and former prescription drugs now sold over the counter.

NyQuil continues to lead the cold category with an estimated 12% share, followed closely by Burroughs Wellcome's Actifed and Sudafed brands, which together have nearly 20% of the market. Both Actifed and Sudafed are former prescription medications.

The generally flat $1.1 billion category that includes both cold and cough remedies, which for years faced a growth rate of about 1% to 2% due to low incidence of colds and flu, now is seeing unit sales increase by about 7%. Last year, unit sales in the cough-cold category grew by about 8%.

Analysts attribute the growth to more colds, flu and other respiratory diseases, paired with a continuing trend toward self-medication.

"We're not seeing double-digit growth, but we are seeing positive unit growth, which is not the case in other categories," said Beth Culligan, director-established brands, Bristol-Myers, which makes Comtrex cold remedy.

R-V executives attribute NyQuil's continued success to its constant selling message that it is the product for "nighttime colds relief." D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles handles.

American Home Products' Dristan, which has been slipping in sales, has dropped to an estimated 7% share. The product was the category leader in the 1960s and '70s, but steady decline in market share has prompted the company to take a different ad approach, emphasizing in tv spots the formula's lack of alcohol, caffeine or aspirin. William Esty Co. handles. Dristan's 1985 ad spending is estimated at $20 million.

In the $300 million cough segment, Robitussin, marketed by A.H. Robins Co., Richmond, Va., and Vicks Formula 44, marketed by Richardson-Vicks, remain leaders with a combined 50% market share. Formula 44, which traditionally targeted children, successfully changed its strategy last year to attract baby-boomer adults via a new ad campaign and a repositioning of its line. Tv spots now airing feature soap opera star Peter Bergman with the theme "The adult formulas. From Vicks, of course." Young & Rubicam is the agency.

Of the four new cold remedies introduced so far this season, Robins' Dimetapp and Warner-Lambert's Benadryl, which are transfers from the prescription-only side, showed the most substantial gains, analysts say.

Warner-Lambert, Morris Plains, N.J., is calling Benadryl its "most successful launch of any otc product," with 1986 sales approaching $50 million. The product made its otc debut in mid-'85 after 40 years as a prescription drug.

"They captured a large share—more than any other brand could hope for," said Oleh Denysyk, pharmaceutical specialist for Charles Kline & Co., Fairfield, N.J., of the two brands.

Benadryl is running network and spot tv, trade and consumer print ads via Sudler & Hennessey. Benadryl ad spending through September was $2.5 million, according to Leading National Advertisers. Dimetapp had $2.2 million in ad spending through September of last year, LNA reported. Scali, McCabe, Sloves handles.

Whether W-L fared as well with another new cough/cold entry, Mediquell cough squares, remains to be seen. While the brand was successful in terms of sales and share, competitors question whether it was wise to invest close to $10 million to introduce the new form of cough remedy, a chewable solid. Ted Bates Advertising has the assignment.

One competitor commented, "It may very well be that W-L wants a solid-form entry as a matter of strategy and is willing to overlook the financial criteria to do that."

Another emerging trend is segmenting. While children's medicines once were lesser dosages of adult formulas, new products offer separate medications for the two groups.

McNeil Consumer Products Co., Fort Washington, Pa., a division of Johnson & Johnson, launched Pedia Care, which it claims is the only symptom-specific medicine for children. The line was supported by $2.6 million during the first nine months of last year, according to LNA.

For the most part, cough-cold advertising remains uninspired, with most marketers sticking to tried-and-true efficacy spots. Procter & Gamble's struggling Head & Chest brand, with a 2% share, is airing spots that show plastic, inflatable dummies to dramatize how a cold "deflates."

"It's a magnificent dramatization of the benefits of better breathing," said Peter Husting, the P&G vp-account person at Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, which created the spot.

The spots claim that Head & Chest relieves a stuffy head and note that the product contains the active ingredient "guaifenesin," a decongestant-expectorant for "better breathing from head to chest."

Bristol-Myers' straightforward "Comtrex. That's all. Nothing else" has enabled the well established brand to retain a respectable 7% share. Laurence, Charles, Free & Lawson handles.

Miles Laboratories' Alka-Seltzer Plus has followed its winning 1984-85 campaign, which sampled a whole town in Maine, with more testimonials by "real users." Sources say Alka-Seltzer Plus is seeing gains because of its advertising and patented formula. The campaign, estimated at $12 million, is handled by Wells, Rich, Greene.

With strong recommendations from pharmacists, Drixoral, a former prescription product marketed by Schering-Plough Corp., saw its share grow from 5% to 8% without consumer advertising. Sources say Schering is considering consumer advertising, but the company said it has no plans for a campaign. So far, the company has run some limited coupon ads via Ketchum Advertising/San Francisco.

Philadelphia-based Menley & James Labs' Contac, which continues to decline in share (from 10% last season to 8% this season), has returned to an efficacy story in advertising after trying an upbeat but unsuccessful effort via BBDO last year themed "Contac keeps you on your feet."

The creative strategy developed by BBDO this year uses a tongue-in-cheek approach. In the spots, comedian Steve Landesberg notes that Contac beats all the competition, even Mom's chicken soup.

While last year's spots failed to register strong enough emotional appeal to improve the brand's market share, the jury is still out on the new spots. Some question whether any kind of lighthearted approach can produce sales in a serious category. "A cold is nothing to sneeze at," said one source.#

Also contributing to this story were senior editor-marketing Nancy Giges in New York and reporter Laurie Freeman in Chicago.

Shares of the cold-remedy market

New rules for cigaret ads set for U.K.

By LAUREL WENTZ

LONDON—The U.K. tobacco industry is bracing itself for a new set of voluntary cigaret advertising regulations that sources expect to be more restrictive than current guidelines.

The new regulations are being negotiated by the industry and the U.K. government and are expected to be announced before the current agreement expires in March.

While cigaret ads are banned outright from tv and radio, regulations and restrictions pertaining to print, cinema and outdoor board advertising are voluntary. However, they are strictly followed by tobacco marketers.

Neither the government's Department of Health & Social Services nor the Tobacco Advisory Council, negotiating on behalf of cigaret companies, will reveal details of the new pact. Clive Turner, director of public affairs for the tobacco council, said only that he expects "a few changes, some fine-tuning" in the new guidelines.

But other sources said they expect the new rules to be more restrictive than current regulations.

"There's never been such a time of intense pressure on the government for meaningful legislation," said David Simpson, director of the government-funded antismoking group ASH. "I'd find it amazing if the government were to announce an agreement with no changes."

He said the government is under pressure to require stiffer health warnings on cigarets and to abolish sponsorship of sports events by the cigaret companies.

The government may be negotiating a shorter, more emphatic health warning that would be attributed to the British equivalent of the U.S. Surgeon General, according to sources. The current statement, "Danger—Government Health Warning: Cigarets can seriously damage your health," is almost unchanged since 1971.

Sources said the government and the tobacco industry are also discussing a ban on cigaret ads in magazines with large numbers of teen age readers. A number of U.K. magazines aimed at teen age girls already refuse to carry cigaret ads.

Under the current code, print, outdoor board and cinema ads are permitted for cigarets with a tar count lower than 19mg, but expenditure is limited by a formula that allows cigaret companies to spend 60% or less of the amount they spent on ads in 1980, with adjustments for inflation. Also, the health warning must fill 15% of print ads and outdoor boards.

A separate agreement between the government and the tobacco industry covering sports sponsorship expired at the end of 1985, but is not expected to be replaced until the cigaret advertising pact is finished. However, the U.K.'s new sports minister, Richard Tracey, is considered to be more sympathetic to the health lobby than previous sports ministers.

In a recent speech, Mr. Tracey said, "One potential conflict of objectives is sports sponsorship. We want to encourage sponsorship money in sports, but we want to save lives through reducing the consumption of tobacco."

A spokesman for the opposition Labor party recently announced that if Labor wins the national elections to be held in 1987 the new government will ban all cigaret ads and sports sponsorship by tobacco companies.

Worldwide ad spending growth

Foreign ad growth lower than U.S. rate

An Advertising Age roundup

Ad spending growth outside the U.S. will lag behind the growth in ad spending domestically this year, according to the latest ADVERTISING AGE survey of major foreign markets.

Foreign ad growth is crucial to many global agencies that derive, in some cases, more than 50% of their billings outside the U.S.

The forecast shows real growth, with inflation factored out, at 5% in the U.K., 4% in France and 3% in Germany. Together these countries account for the lion's share of European ad spending. The other major advertising market in the world, Japan, is expected to grow 4%. These forecasts are based on interviews with advertisers and agencies worldwide, and are expressed in local currencies without accounting for possible currency devaluations.

Ad spending in the U.S. in 1986 is expected to grow about 8%, without inflation factored out, according to Robert Coen, senior vp-director of forecasting, McCann-Erickson.

Many advertisers and agencies in the U.S. believe foreign ad spending will be surprisingly strong in 1986, as European economies recover.

"Europe looks pretty good, particularly Germany relative to its past when spending has been the same or up a shade," Mr. Coen said. "Now there is some possibility it will grow faster than inflation."

Mr. Coen bullishly predicted that foreign ad spending will jump 9% in 1986, compared with 8.5% in 1985. But he acknowledged he has been overly optimistic in the past, and often revises his figures downward as the year progresses.

Many sources agreed that if the dollar stays where it is or continues to fall relative to foreign currencies, U.S.-based companies will show strong gains in their foreign earnings, which have been battered over the years by the strong dollar.

Rarely have international ad executives noticed as much uncertainty in foreign markets.

"There is a lot going on in Europe right now, what with the weakening dollar and weakening oil prices," said Bill Tragos, TBWA Advertising's chief executive officer. "But consumers are starting to spend and we expect them to spend more in 1986. You can only hang black crepe for so long."

"The big question is England," said Willi Schalk, president of BBDO International Group. Some sources believe U.K. ad expenditures will grow only 2% in real terms, and are much more bearish than AD AGE or Mr. Coen.

Mr. Schalk said he is taking a second look at the U.K. because of the decline in oil prices, which directly affects the U.K. as an oil-producing nation, and because the pound sterling is not rising as expected with the dollar's decline.

Other admen said the shaky state of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's government could also influence U.K. ad spending.

"The economic situation [in the U.K.] just doesn't look as promising as we had hoped," Mr. Schalk said. But he added that, conversely, the outlook in Germany, France and Spain appears promising.

In Germany, Europe's largest ad market at $6.2 billion, ad spending may jump between 2% and 4% in 1986 after years of relatively flat growth—up only 1% last year. Increased budgets are most likely to come from car marketers, the service industries, airlines and pharmaceuticals.

Other sources predict that, as in past years, mar-pated large number of advertisers and audience. U.S. tv series "Dynasty," the highest rated show in morning tv, is only drawing a 10.5% rating (percentage of households viewing tv), according to a McCann-Erickson study. Despite the ratings, morning tv ad rates remain as high as those in the afternoon, when the audiences size is double.

NEW YORK—Toy Manufacturers of America and the Japanese Toy Assn. signed an agreement this month guaranteeing U.S. toy marketers $8.8 million in retail shelf space in Japan in 1986, $11.6 million in 1987 and $14.4 million in 1988. In 1985, U.S. companies sold $6 million worth of toys in Japan, while Japan sold $140 million in the U.S.

MELBOURNE—D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles lost its national creative director, Noel Delbridge, who resigned earlier this month after 26 years with the agency to join Mojo Advertising. DMB&B also lost the Queensland Liberal party account, which it handled for 11 years. Norris Brown & Associates picked up the account.

TOKYO—All Nippon Airways, Japan's largest domestic airline, will make its first international flight in March to Guam. ANA also is awaiting government approval in Japan to fly to Los Angeles and Washington. Dentsu, Hakuhodo and Asahi Advertising share the account.

TOKYO—Takara, Japan's largest producer of Shochu, a popular vodka-like traditional liquor, has purchased Scotland's bankrupt Tomatin Distillery Co. for an undisclosed price.

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi has appointed John Makinson, a former column editor of the Financial Times, to assist chairman Andrew Wood with U.S. acquisitions. Mr. Makinson either has no job title yet, or the agency refuses to divulge it.

PM blocks anti-smoking slogans

By JACK BURTON

STOCKHOLM—Philip Morris Cos. has temporarily blocked the Swedish government from placing new anti-smoking messages on cigaret packs.

Sweden's Social Welfare Board recently proposed placing slogans on cigaret packs urging smokers to either refrain from smoking at their jobs or to quit altogether.

The slogans included, "Do you want to stop smoking? Many have done it. Pick a day and just stop." Another proposed slogan says, "Don't bother your fellow workers with tobacco smoke. It is damaging and irritating."

But PM argued that the new slogans are illegal because they violate a 1975 law requiring health warnings on cigaret packs. PM claimed the law only requires notification of possible health risks, not slogans urging smokers to change their habits.

A variety of health warnings appears on Swedish packs. They include, "Increased cancer risks: Smoking increases the risk of cancer in the lungs, mouth, stomach, throat and bladder" and "For those pregnant, smoking during pregnancy can harm your child."

The government is considering PM's objections and will issue a final ruling on the matter, although no timetable has been set.

Marcos marketed like U.S. politician

Opponent heavy on radio ads

By KATHLEEN BARNES

MANILA—Ferdinand Marcos called on a sophisticated, U.S.-style political marketing strategy, with help from President Reagan's former advisers and heavy tv advertising, in his battle to stay in power in the Philippines.

By contrast, Corazon Aquino used radio and newspaper ads, as well as posters and buttons, in a campaign thrown together by a handful of volunteers from an assortment of ad agencies.

Results of the Feb. 7 presidential election are still being contested, with both sides claiming victory amid charges of vote fraud and intimidation by the Marcos forces.

On Feb. 10, the Philippine National Assembly convened to certify the vote and declare a winner, but arguments over procedure delayed any action. Five days later, the assembly declared Mr. Marcos the winner.

Matthew Freedman, vp at the Washington lobbying company of Black, Manafort, Stone & Kelly, was hired to work on improving Mr. Marcos' image both at home and in the U.S. In 1984, three of the BMS&K's senior partners worked on President Reagan's reelection campaign.

BMS&K, which reportedly is being paid $950,000 for the first year, was hired by an organization called the Chamber of Philippine Manufacturers, Exports & Tourist Assns.

On the local level, Mr. Marcos has his regular "backroom boys," former newspapermen turned presidential staff members, on the government payroll at the National Media Production Center here. The staff was responsible for the Marcos press mill, which spewed out releases, backgrounders and commentaries.

CORAZON AQUINO

The staff also produced all of Mr. Marcos' tv commercials without the help of any professional ad agencies.

Mrs. Aquino's campaign centered on radio ads created by volunteers from at least nine agencies, including J. Walter Thompson Co., Hemisphere Leo Burnett and Bates Alcantara.

One radio spot featured the popular song "Tie a Yellow Ribbon 'round the Old Oak Tree," which is sentimentally attached to Mrs. Aquino's assassinated husband, Benigno, who was killed on his return to the Philippines from self-imposed exile.

Although the spot became a focal point of the radio campaign, one adman said using so many volunteers from different shops caused problems.

Nat Caluag of Hemisphere Leo Burnett said the agencies were not being paid and, as a result, each shop worked individually, despite efforts to coordinate by Reli German, Mrs. Aquino's advertising supervisor.

Mrs. Aquino tried early in the campaign to place some tv ads, but she was denied airtime by two government-owned tv stations, Channels 4 and 13.

Representatives of the tv stations said they were not obliged to accept Mrs. Aquino's spots.

The issue was challenged before the Commission on Elections, but Mrs. Aquino's representatives failed to appear at the Jan. 30 hearing, so the matter was dismissed.#

Ad growth

keters may reduce their budgets in selected categories.

In France, ad agencies and marketers are cautious. Legislative elections in March may pit an opposition party against President Francois Mitterrand, who doesn't face reelection until 1988. That could wreak havoc in France, where economic life is closely tied to politics.

Another issue is media. No one is certain how much two new private, advertiser-supported tv networks, which come on line in 1986, will affect ad spending. Some predict that the consensus forecast of 4% ad expenditure growth could turn out to be conservative.

In Spain, ad spending is expected to rise about 13% in 1986. "We expect to see a bigger increase in ad investment this year as a consequence of Spain's entry into the European Economic Community in January," said Francisco Gonzalez, president of Grey Espana.

But some admen point out that 1986 may not be as good a year as it looks in Spain.

"With public attention centered on four sets of elections scheduled for this year, advertisers may decide to cut spending significantly," said Manolo Ramiro, president of Lintas S.A.

Meanwhile, Japan appears headed for minimal ad spending growth.

"It's a flat market," said Jerry Roberts, chief executive officer of DYR Inc., a joint Dentsu-Young & Rubicam-owned agency.

Ad industry watchers think the Japanese ad industry hit bottom last year with no growth, when top advertisers like Suntory International and Japan Airlines drastically cut back their ad spending.

But the 4% forecast for 1986 is based on the expectation that key advertisers will resume earlier spending patterns.

Australia also had a slow 1985 with only 2% growth in ad spending. No growth is expected this year.

"The figures reflect the state of the Australian economy," said Robert Koltai, director-corporate marketing of Colgate-Palmolive.

In Brazil, the biggest advertising market in Latin America, ad spending jumped 10% in 1985 after suffering an 18% decline in 1984. But the industry fears 1986 will bring another bout of high inflation, which will probably result in a 5% growth in ad spending.

Mexico also had a relatively good year in 1985, with ad spending increasing 13%, but the peso devaluation diluted the impact of that growth on U.S. balance sheets. This year Mexican admen are expecting more peso devaluations, and no growth in ad spending.#

VW trying to shake its 'one-car image'

Brazilian-built model to target new buyers, second-car sales

By JESSE SNYDER

TROY, MICH.—Marketers at Volkswagen United States and agency Doyle Dane Bernbach are chortling at the prospect of having a "Beetle-like" entry-level car again in less than a year.

A Brazilian-built, small Volkswagen due next January will be aimed at both the entry-level 18-to 30-year-old market of first new-car buyers and as a second or third car for older families who remember owning or riding in Beetles, said James Fuller, vp in charge of VWUS, the VW sales arm for Volkswagen of America.

"It's not only an ideal second car for 2 million former or current VW owners, it's an 'appetizer course' for first-time buyers who will buy an average of 16 new cars in their lives," Mr. Fuller said in an interview.

But first VW must shake a lingering image that the auto maker is a "one-car company."

The creative solution is 15-second commercials (AA, Jan. 23) that will be VW's primary tv format through at least next fall, said Richard Marcy, director of marketing.

VW is using 15s on news and sports breaks to ensure daily prime time exposure.

"The 15s give us a chance to show off a wide variety of new product this spring and build awareness that Volkswagen is not a one-car company," Mr. Marcy said.

The Beetle so much became the symbol of Volkswagen between 1949 and 1975 that VW still is struggling to shed that single-car image despite marketing two compacts, a sporty two-door, midsize sedan and a minivan.

Broadening awareness is important with a variety of new models this spring.

But the new car imported by Volkswagen from Brazil makes the image-freshening essential. It is still code-named Project 99, "because our first choice for a name flopped when we tested it," Mr. Fuller said.

The Brazilian car will come in four-door sedan and two-door station wagon versions and be priced under $6,000 to compete with the Yugo and Hyundai Excel and others in the emerging under-$7,000 segment.

The strategic reposition and spring introductions gave VW more interest in investigating 15s than other auto marketers, who largely have spurned the format as too short to transmit product information.

VW will introduce a face-lifted Quantum midsize series, a 16-valve Scirocco, four-wheel-drive Synchro versions of the Quantum and Vanagon and Wolfsburg limited-edition packages on the Jetta, Golf and GTI by May.

All but the Golf and GTI are imported from West Germany and VW's traditional uncertainty of delivery also affected the creative approach.

Research showed 15s tested 75% as effective as 30s in building awareness at 60% to 70% of the cost, Mr. Marcy said.

The VW 15-second spots use a no-background beauty shot of a car with a voiceover that can be changed quickly to "keep us topical," said William Gelgotta, ad manager.

Tying 15s to a news break or sports break avoids clutter, gives VW a de facto auto exclusivity and gives viewers a "sense of getting something valuable," Mr. Marcy said.

"Tv is still very important to us," he said. "It still is the prime medium for image building. Of course, it puts even more pressure on our print ads to convey product information."

effect of its reformulation began wearing off. Coke's score rose only slightly in January.

The also-rans among soft-drink advertisers include 7UP, which remains No. 3 in soft-drink ad awareness with 4.0% first mentions, and two Coca-Cola brands, Diet Coke and Sprite, tied for fourth with 2% of first mentions.

The category probably will begin heating up in the next few months as Pepsi and Coke both break campaigns loaded with celebrities and 7UP's "Feels so good comin' down," its first campaign from Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, has a chance to take hold.

Consumers were able to come up with fast-food ads off the tops of their heads more than any other category. The 10 unaided, best recalled advertisers in January were, in descending order, McDonald's, Burger King, Coca-Cola, Wendy's, Budweiser/Bud Light, Ford, Miller/Miller Lite, Pepsi, AT&T and Chrysler.

The following are last month's top three advertisers in other product categories:

- Airlines: United (12% of first mentions); American (11.6%); Eastern (10.8%). Eastern's score is up 2.8 percentage points over December with its ads for winter fares to Florida. Delta's score dropped 3.5 percentage points because its January media schedule dropped.
- Apparel: Levi Strauss (8.5%); J.C. Penney (2.9%); Sears (2.7%).
- Beer: Budweiser (13.7%); Coors (11.6%); Miller (7.7%).
- Breakfast foods: Wheaties (8.1%); Cheerios (6.3%); Kellogg (5.0%).
- Bread: Wonder (14.2%); Sunbeam (2.5%); Rainbo (2.1%).
- Cameras: Kodak (25.0%); Canon (11.6%); Polaroid (6.7%). Kodak's score jumped 6.8 percentage points over last month after a strong pre and post-Christmas blitz.
- Cars & trucks: Ford (20.8%); Chevrolet (13.1%); Toyota (6.6%).
- Coffee: Folgers (22.3%); Maxwell House (17.1%); Hills Brothers (5.9%).
- Computers: Apple (24.6%); IBM (17.7%); Commodore (5.7%). Apple's share of first mentions dropped 5.6 points because the company has shifted its media mix from tv to print and radio.
- Cosmetics: Maybelline (3.9%); Cover Girl (3.0%); Revlon (2.8%).
- Home electronics: General Electric (5.1%); Sony (3.6%); RCA (2.7%).
- Financial institutions: Merrill Lynch (3.8%); E.F. Hutton (2.9%); Dean Witter (3.1%).
- Frozen food: Bird's Eye (9.6%); Swanson (5.0%); Stouffer (3.7%).
- Laundry products: Tide (22.7%); Cheer (4.5%); All (4.2%). Tide's share of first mentions fell 3.4 percentage points after a light media schedule in January.
- Liquor: Jack Daniels (2.4%); Seagram's (2.3%); Bacardi (1.4%).
- Medicine & drugs: Tylenol (21.6%); Advil (5.8%); Bayer (5.7%).
- Overnight mail: Federal Express (28.8%); UPS (9.6%); U.S. Express Mail (5.8%).
- Pet foods: Purina (11.9%); Alpo (8.9%); Kibbles'N Bits (3.6%).
- Soap & shampoo: Ivory (8.8%); Head & Shoulders (6.5%); Prell (6.3%).
- Tea: Lipton (34.7%); Nestea (2.7%); Tetley (2.6%).
- Tires: Goodyear (15.9%); Michelin (11.7%); Firestone (7.8%).
- Tobacco: Marlboro (7.2%); Skoal (3.6%); Winston (3.1%).
- Wine: Riunite (9.8%); Gallo (8.2%); Paul Masson (2.3%).

Stan Richards wants an airline account. His Dallas-based Richards Group used to have an airline, Muse Air. But in June last year it was absorbed by Southwest Airlines. Just before the buyout, Muse founder and chairman Lamar Muse paid Richards a great compliment: If it hadn't been for the work his agency did, Muse said, Southwest would have picked up the near-bankrupt Muse for next to nothing. As it was, the agency's campaign, touting money-back guarantees and free flights to smokers who would not smoke on the plane, increased load factors and operational profits enough that Southwest had to shell out $60 million for Muse. See Page 4.

Business is picking up for the Hispanic market, but advertising agency and media executives say it still lacks the recognition it deserves. Advertisers spent $333.5 million to reach the Hispanic market in 1985, up 17.2% from 1984. From 1980 to 1985, the Hispanic market rose 16%, to 16.9 million people, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. DFS, Dorland forge deal

NEW YORK—Dancer Fitzgerald Sample and Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s Dorland Advertising subsidiary, reported earlier to have begun merger conversations (AA, Sept. 23), have completed a deal creating DFS Dorland Worldwide, with $1.2 billion in billings. DFS' billings in 1985 were $876 million; London-based Dorland's topped $200 million. The deal is not actually a sale at this time—Dorland will lend $75 million (with interest) to DFS' top five executives, who in turn will create a new company, DFS Management, to buy all existing shares from DFS stockholders. Simultaneously, Dorland has been granted an option to buy 100% of DFS. There will be another payment in 1991 to DFS Management. DFS' pretax profits were $17.6 million in the year ended last Aug. 31.

BankAmerica picks A&D

SAN FRANCISCO—BankAmerica Corp. has selected Allen & Dorward to handle its new $4 million-to-$5 million corporate image account. A&D beat out Ketchum Advertising for the account (AA, Oct. 7). It joins Ketchum and Grey Advertising as BankAmerica agencies.

Federal expresses interest

MEMPHIS—Federal Express Corp. will be a sponsor of the 1988 Winter and Summer Olympics via a marketing agreement announced Feb. 26 with the International Olympic Committee, the USOC and local organizers of the Seoul and Calgary games. Ally & Gargano, New York, handles. Separately, Federal Express has selected the Cherenson Group, Livingston, N.J., for a new eastern regional ad effort.

SAN BRUNO, CAL.—DHL Worldwide Express on March 9 will kick off a $4.5 million tv and print campaign in 13 major markets, pitching its overseas document delivery services. A new tag line—"Why fool around with an air express service that delivers less of the world?"—plays off rival Federal Express Corp.'s "Why fool around with anyone else?" theme. Ted Bates Advertising/New York handles.

WASHINGTON—A $2 million spot tv campaign breaks here today lashing Nicaragua's Sandinista government. Other markets will be added later. It seems like every other tv commercial uses a down-home, folksy character to push products. Is the Hokey Joe version of Americana the image for the '80s, or will the Bartles & Jaymes clones vanish before the year is out?

Larry Stillman, senior partner-group creative director, Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago: "I think that sort of thing has been around long before Bartles & Jaymes, but it took Bartles & Jaymes to really make it a popular and widely imitated style. That campaign is done so well and everything else that uses old characters is so imitative, I think it will diminish. While I think the 'old coots' kind of Americana is going to drop off, I think Americana in the sense of a celebration of America will continue strong."

L. STILLMAN

Edward Littleford, executive creative director, Foote, Cone & Belding, New York: "No. The down-home imagery is as old as the hills and will endure. The Bartles & James Ma and Pa Kettle-type ads are the third wave, and will continue to spawn a host of imitators. These imitators, however, may miss the point—the campaign is not only some people rocking on a porch, there is a sound marketing idea behind it. The imitators will pick up on the cosmetics of it, but it will be devoid of a marketing idea."

Bob Matsumoto, president, Matsumoto-Herzog, Los Angeles: "It won't last. The Bartles & Jaymes stuff is good, but a lot of the copies aren't executed as well and aren't effective. Most of it won't stand out in the clutter. So the trend will pass. That's the history of advertising, isn't it?"

B. MATSUMOTO

M. GOLDSTEIN

Mark Goldstein, exec vp-corporate creative director, Earle Palmer Brown Cos., Bethesda, Md.: "The advertising business, like music, film and the theater, loves to jump on bandwagons. In the mid-'70s it was disco. In the late '70s it was 'Star Wars.' In the early '80s it was new wave, and in the mid-'80s it's Ronald Reagan and real-people Americans. What's next beats the hell out of me. One trend I like is the tendency to use people who look like they're neighbors and not out of Central Casting. I find that refreshing."

Allan Beaver, executive vp-creative director, Levine Huntley Schmidt & Beaver, New York: "I don't think it's the direction for the '80s, I think it's a technique of the moment. . .a simple technique and a refreshing alternative to the big-budget, slick campaigns currently in vogue. I have always believed the best and most effective campaign is one based on a good idea, executed simply and directly. And basically that's what these executions are—ordinary people talking directly to the viewer."

Hispanic Marketing

Prime space available at low rates

By Ed Fitch

If the Hispanic market were an outdoor board, it probably would read: "Prime space, cheap rates. Call Hispanic advertising agencies and media for further details."

It promises a good return on investment, yet the Hispanic market is taking a pasting. Hispanic segment ad agency and media professionals, while agreeing business is getting hotter, would be the first to admit if it were salsa picante (hot sauce), it would hardly make anyone's tongue curl.

"The business community has not recognized the magnitude of the market," says Enrique Loza, president, Americas Inc., a Chicago-based Hispanic market agency. "The percentage of dollars going into the Hispanic market is still ridiculous."

Also contributing to this story were Candace Campbell and Marcy Gray Rubin, who covered the soft drink industry and Spanish-language tv, respectively, in this Special Report.

Although expenditures to the U.S. Hispanic market have increased, those involved in the market say expenditures still fall far short of the segment's contribution to many company's profits. In fact, as the Hispanic market has gained demographic clout and media attention, advertisers' commitments to the market have slowed.

Total ad dollars devoted to the Hispanic market stood at $333.5 million in 1985, according to Hispanic Business, Santa Barbara, Cal. While this represented a 17.2% increase over 1984 expenditures, the 1983 to 1984 increase stood at 26.8%, and 1983 budgets rose 35.2% over 1982. The rate of companies' dollar investments in the market is lagging.

"I cannot recall any major breakthroughs in new categories of advertisers," says Jorge Caballero, president of Jorge Caballero & Associates, a Chicago-based agency. "Not one new major company has come in."

The same names seem to appear year after year on Hispanic Business' listing of top Hispanic market advertisers. "For the most part, it's package goods companies and more package goods companies," says Jesus Chavarria, editor-publisher, Hispanic Business.

"You may see some new action in a few categories. But a lot of areas—particularly service providers—have yet to do much," he says.

In 1983, 1984 and 1985, the top 25 Hispanic market advertisers' Hispanic budgets were less than 1% of their general market ad expenditures. The best Hispanic-market-to-total-ad-budget ratio occurred in 1984 when the top 25 advertisers' committed 0.99% of their budgets to the Hispanic market. That figure fell to 0.84% in 1985.

Put simply, the top 25 Hispanic market advertisers are allocating less than 1% of the amount they spend on the general population to reach 7.2% of America's residents, according to a U.S Bureau of Census December report. To paint the over-all picture, consider that these companies are the segment's 25 biggest supporters.

According to Hispanic Business, in 1985 the top 30 Hispanic market advertisers spent $78 million. This is $1.2 million less than Hershey Foods' total ad budget. Hershey was the 88th largest national advertiser, according to Advertising Age.

"The amount of money corporate America spends to address the Hispanic market is a pittance when compared to total advertising expenditures," says Tony Bonilla, chairman, National Hispanic Leadership Conference, a Washington-based think tank.

Many of the companies that direct some dollars to the Hispanic market have curtailed those investments, Mr. Caballero says.

"And companies that are spending a substantial amount of money are not spending in relation to the size of the Hispanic market."

According to the Census Bureau, from 1980 to 1985 the over-all population increased 3.3%. During the same time the Hispanic market rose 16%, to 16.9 million people.

Not only did the raw numbers rise, but the quality of the segment also improved, says Lennart Ringquist, president of New York-based BlairSpan, a John Blair & Co. subsidiary that produces and syndicates Spanish-language programing. "The market is constantly being fed by immigrants," he says, "and the quality of that immigrant is accelerating."

Previous waves of immigrants may have been primarily unskilled laborers, Mr. Ringquist says, while new arrivals today possess more marketable and professional skills—and therefore greater disposable income.

Hispanics' 1984 median family income hit $18,833, according to the Census Bureau's recent report. Although this fell well below the total population's figure of $26,433, it represents a significant improvement over the segment's 1982 median family income of $16,228.

The market's improving demographics and spending patterns demand more response from advertisers, Hispanic ad executives say.

"There seems to be the attitude, 'Give them $100,000 to keep them happy,'" says one executive. "How do you expect to reach 20 million people today with such a small budget? There are a lot more social issues here than meet the eye—a lot of tokenism."

Some people simply will not approach the market. "A great deal of attitude goes to 'Why should we cater to Latinos?' and 'Why don't they speak English?'" Mr. Loza says.

This posture, he says, has nothing to do with a business analysis.

"I believe there is a bit of prejudice and ignorance of who Hispanics are and what they buy," Mr. Caballero says. He illustrates the point with a story about a marketing executive at a shampoo manufacturer who said they didn't target Hispanics because they don't have an ethnic product.

"My thought was, 'What is a Hispanic shampoo?' It's the same one everyone else is using. They also say there aren't numbers, but the numbers have been there for years."

The more information a Hispanic ad agency or media company can present, the faster companies will come around, says Castor Fernandez, president, Castor Spanish International, a New York-based Hispanic marketing agency. "I've been doing this for 18 years and God knows I want to spark businesses into doing more, but advertising agencies aren't the answers."

Many times agencies are the catalyst, he says, "but what's needed is more market information."

If Hispanic ad agencies pursue business, their actions are viewed as self-serving, says Hector Elizalde, director-Hispanic marketing, Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo. The lack of documentation also is a problem.

"You know what MBA types are like," he says. "They aren't going to move unless it's well documented."

Another reason the Hispanic market hasn't been sought effectively is companies must commit to approaching it from the top down, Mr. Elizalde says, a commitment some companies do not make.

"That's what makes the difference between companies—how much they do and how well they do it," he says.

Strangely, some companies pour millions of dollars into multinational operations in Latin America, yet do not invest in the U.S. Hispanic market, says Jacqueline Da Costa, senior vp-media director, Ted Bates Advertising/New York. The immigrant factor makes this situation more astounding, Mr. Loza says.

"No matter where we come from, we all grow up with Kraft and Quaker; we know Goodyear, Ford, Chevrolet," he says. "We grow up dreaming of owning American cars, American televisions. We struggle through forests and jungles to get to America to buy those things. It is a lot nicer and easier if someone puts them right in our path through a radio or tv spot."

Ms. Da Costa says the multinational companies are missing a sure bet. "They let strong franchises slip through their fingers because they are unwilling to make the same commitments they have overseas."

Although the home-grown Hispanic market is large, corporate America may not consider it sizable enough to justify the manpower and investments needed to target it professionally. "It's like reaching out to any segment," Mr. Caballero says. Companies must commit to performing research and developing a total marketing program to sell their products, he says.

A spokesman for White Plains, N.Y.-based General Foods affirms Mr. Caballero's suppositions.

Any marketing segmentation diverts funds and involves twice as much research and effort to launch as a national campaign, he says, adding that national campaigns typically yield 10 times to 20 times more revenue for the same amount of effort.

Yet General Foods is a big Hispanic market supporter. In 1985 it spent $2 million advertising to Hispanics, enough to make it the No. 13 advertiser on the Hispanic Business list.

The company's active role, the spokeman says, is "a matter of upfront faith." It also does not hurt that General Foods has the internal research capabilities "to identify and invest in product opportunities here and in Latin America. If our estimates turn out to be right, we don't need as many hard numbers."

The company initially overspends to attract consumers and then tightens up, he says, rather than underspend and not reach the target.

General Foods' approach may become the preferred method of investigating the Hispanic market: Dangle some toes, test the water and then jump in—or at least wade in to shin depth. Even halfhearted attempts would be welcomed by those who are certain the results would encourage more activity.

"My only hope is companies will see the fruits of the little they are doing and be encouraged to continue and expand those efforts," Mr. Loza says. "The business community needs to review its marketing efforts, and when it does it will find this is a good segment to increase the bottom line."

Hispanic media and advertising professionals would like to see that outdoor board read: "Prime space, reasonable—not cheap—rates."

Network vs. independents spices up programing

By Marcy Gray Rubin

Caramba, there's someone else out there. Imagine living in a town that had only one tv station. One day, you turn on the set and suddenly find two channels.

Your reaction most likely would be similar to those of Hispanics in cities finally served by two fulltime Spanish-language tv stations—they seem to be watching both.

Spanish-language tv broadcasting has been dominated by New York-based SIN Television Network and its host of 364 satellite affiliates. But that stronghold is being challenged by a string of independents struggling to win recognition in their markets.

This changing competitive picture perhaps is best illustrated by activity in New York, Los Angeles and Chicago. In Los Angeles, independent newcomer KVEA-TV is challenging powerhouse SIN affiliate KMEX-TV. After the launch of SIN's newest brainchild, WSNS-TV, independent WBBS-TV bowed out of the Chicago market, leaving only WCIU-TV to battle WSNS for viewers. And in New York, the 19-year battle between SIN's WXTV and independent WNJU-TV continues to heat up.

New York

By SIN executives' own admission, New York remains their toughest market. While independent WNJU typically has maintained a slight edge, that may be changing.

According to Eileen Martinez Holmes, vp-general sales manager, WXTV, New York, studies done by Miami-based Strategy Research Corp. gave WXTV 50% to 55% of all prime-time Hispanic audiences from October to November.

Ms. Holmes credits the boost to Rosita Peru, SIN's vp-programing, who has concentrated on cultivating larger youth audiences through contemporary-style novelas and variety programs.

The growing numbers of New York's South and Central Americans also are not being reached by her competitor's programing, she says.

Although Ms. Holmes says that "sometimes being a network affiliate can be restrictive," she stresses the over-all advantage. "Belonging to SIN forces us to maintain their high standards. It gives WXTV our professional polish, our sophisticated on-air look."

Ms. Holmes illustrates this statement with a reference to WXTV's locally produced 6 p.m. newscast, which she says is seen in 383,000 Hispanic households —representing a 100% increase over last year.

Marcy Gray Rubin is a New York-based free-lance writer and former reporter for Back Stage.

Generally, WXTV's format typifies SIN's reliance on foreign, particularly Mexican-oriented programing, a policy SIN's opponents criticize. "We buy the best Spanish-language programing available—regardless of origin—that appeals to our affiliate audiences," says William Stiles, SIN's exec vp. This programing includes musicals, morning and late-night talk shows, live sports events, Spanish-language films, children's and comedy shows, and, of course, the novelas that are the backbone of Hispanic programing, he says.

Like all SIN affiliates, WXTV carries a number of network-produced programs, the most impressive of which is "Noticiero SIN." This half-hour, Miami-based 6:30 p.m. newscast follows the affiliate news and provides in-depth international coverage. According to John Pero, SIN's exec vp-sales, the newscast costs the network more than $4 million annually to produce.

A new network entry "Mundo Latino," the first U.S.-produced Spanish-language morning talk show, kicked off in late January. The show's style suggests it could have been named "Buenos Dias America" because its format—interviews, current events, news, sports and weather—is similar to "Good Morning America." The show is broadcast live from Los Angeles and Miami with special reports filed from New York and Washington. WXTV supplements the national program with a weekday talk show called "New York Ahora."

Network vs. independent stations

Like many independents, WNJU's programing targets its specific market, carrying a heavier share of "Caribbean" programing aimed at New York's predominantly Puerto Rican and Dominican Republic Hispanic population.

Carlos Barba, the station's president-general manager, says when he first came to WNJU in 1970, the oldest existing Spanish-language station was in severe disarray. "Sales were at $1.2 million, expenses were at $3.5 million and they were giving airtime away to advertisers," he says.

Mr. Barba quickly organized focus groups to learn more about his market and audience composition. Discovering that women made up 72% of his daytime audience, he created a horizontal approach to programing centering on novelas, variety shows and more novelas. Action shows were added to the mix at night to attract male viewers. To increase his revenues, Mr. Barba also leases WNJU to other minorities during light Hispanic viewing slots.

Like most of his colleagues, he says his station's primary objective is to provide public service. WNJU pulled in more than $1 million for victims of the recent mudslide in Puerto Rico. During the volcanic eruption in Colombia, Mr. Barba took to the streets for a mobile marathon that resulted in 400 tons of emergency supplies.

Public efforts like these help increase the station's presence in the local community, where local programing may fall short. Although executives at both Spanish-language stations say they would like to increase their local programing, New York production costs limit larger efforts, they say. "I employ seven unions that receive payments and benefits equal to any other station in New York," Mr. Barba says.

A mix of 65% national and 35% local coverage would be ideal, he says. For now Mr. Barba must be content with WNJU's 11 p.m. newscast, public service updates and coverage of Hispanic parades and festivals.

Despite SIN's clout and WNJU's jockeying for position, these two stations may be destined to continue running a never-ending race. Jacqueline Da Costa, senior vp, Ted Bates Advertising/New York, says she incorporates both stations in her media mix, depending on the client's specific needs.

If her target audience is demographically broader, Ms. Da Costa says she selects WXTV. If a narrower audience is desired, she opts for WNJU. When the budget is too small to cover both stations, Ms. Da Costa alternates placements between the two stations each quarter.

Los Angeles

If any station were to be called the Goliath of Spanish-language tv, it would be Los Angeles-based KMEX-TV, SIN's oldest affiliate. KMEX claims to reach 87% of Southern California's Hispanics.

Small wonder then that since the station made its debut in 1962, Daniel Villanueva, president-general manager, has seen a long line of contenders disappear, turn their attention to other minority groups or take what is perhaps an easier competitive route and become English-language stations.

Explaining his station's success, Mr. Villanueva says, "We have a relationship with our viewers that isn't found anywhere else. People refer to KMEX as 'Our Channel 34.' We're filling an incredible communications gap."

According to Strategy Research, last October and November, KMEX captured 45% of the Hispanic prime-time audience as compared to 43% during the same time in 1984.

But the specter of KMEX's domination didn't stop KVEA from entering the ring last November as a fulltime, Spanish-language station. With the exception of KSCI-TV, which broadcasts in Spanish 35% of the time, KMEX was the only game in town.

"We felt the community was underrepresented, having just one fulltime station that also was tied to a network," says Joseph Wallach, KVEA's president-chief executive officer. "We believe both economically and in terms of programing that another station could be supported, giving Latino viewers a choice."

Mario Lazo, media director, Mendoza, Dillon & Asociados, Newport Beach, Cal., agrees. "I certainly think Los Angeles can support two fulltime stations if New York can."

Viewers' choices, according to KVEA executives, are between KMEX's imported programing and KVEA's more locally oriented slant. "You don't see a lot of local coverage on any Spanish-language station except during a catastrophe," Mr. Lazo says. Although the bulk of KMEX's schedule consists of SIN programing, the station does produce its own news, public affairs and sports shows, as well as "Mundo Latino," which is syndicated in 30 markets.

Mr. Villanueva stresses community service to his staff, members of which serve on 29 boards. The station conducts voter registration and citizenship drives, holds annual charity telethons and is credited with doing more public service spots than any other Los Angeles station. During the recent disasters in Puerto Rico, Mexico and Colombia, KMEX raised $11.9 million while providing 24-hour coverage.

Unlike many of its predecessors, Estrella Communications, KVEA's investors, has committed itself to Spanish-language broadcasting in a big way. Station executives say total startup expenditures hit $40 million, including a $500,000 promotional kickoff and an undisclosed local production budget.

In addition to the usual mix of imported programing, KVEA is emphasizing local and community service programing. As of now, efforts include daily 11 p.m. newscasts; minidocumentaries focusing on subjects like employe and Social Security benefits, how to get a driver's license or insurance, and a half-hour magazine show, covering graming and promotions. "A lot of people had been locked out," she says.

"Before only Bud, Miller and Coke were sponsors. Now you're starting to see Coors, Ford, Libby and some cigaret companies come in and use the other outlets."

One caveat before radio gurus cave in to sudden urges to hablan Espanol: The market is not going to be served up on a platter with guacamole on the side. "It won't be easy for them," says Jorge Caballero, president, Jorge Caballero & Associates, a Chicago-based ad agency. "Advertisers are not necessarily increasing the money they spend in the market in relation to the increase in media."

Ms. Stoll puts it simply: "Survival depends on how many advertisers come into the market, and more advertisers need to come into the market."

If WOJO's business had been divided among the market's major stations it would not support all three radio stations, WTAQ's Mr. Newman says. "But now three sales forces are out on the streets."

Advertisers were bypassing Chicago because WOJO's noncompetitive situation did not force them to present hard-hitting sales presentations about the Chicago market, he says. Now all the stations have to be more hard nosed about their business.

Mr. Brooks says Chicago has enough business to keep even more radio stations in the money.

"We have advertisers coming to us who have never gone into the Hispanic market before. We're making the pie bigger," he says.

Although that pie may be bigger, establishing a solid core of listeners may not be a piece of cake.

"The key element in Spanish language media is loyalty," Ms. Sofios says. "The others will have to create a larger audience."

The stations have embarked on aggressive promotional efforts to accomplish this task, and Mr. Newman says the market will expand.

"There is no animosity here, just clean, pure competition. Our main concern is uplifting the market."

health, education and employment opportunities. A woman's show also is being developed.

Estrella also purchased the rights to syndicate Spanish-dubbed series like "Daktari," and "Medical Center," as well as feature films "Doctor Zhivago" and "Coma." Additionally the station has joined New York-based NetSpan's consortium and will carry its "Espectacular" specials.

Although KVEA executives remain confident about the future, they are realistic about their Herculean task. "KMEX is a powerhouse, a household staple," says Paul Niedermeyer, KVEA general manager. "To try and topple their superiority we have to achieve close to 40% share of the ratings."

According to Arbitron, the station's share grew from 32% the first week to 41% in five weeks. A more recent sampling, however, puts the split 85% in favor of KMEX, SIN's Mr. Stiles says. This mirrors the national picture, he says, where in any given market independents draw 20% to 30% of the viewers compared with SIN affiliates' typical 70% to 85%.

Mr. Wallach remains confident. "We are fighting aggressively to find our niche. We have brought our influence into what was a sleepy, one station market," he says. "KMEX is reacting with a healthy competitiveness, which enables more choices for the viewer and the advertiser."

Mr. Villanueva says he is interested in seeing what Mr. Wallach will do in the market. "I welcome KVEA and look forward to having someone else share the load," he says, "because ultimately the biggest beneficiaries will be the Hispanic community."

Los Angeles' Hispanic community currently stands at 4.5 million, he says, and is expected to reach 6.2 million by 1990.

"I'm sure we can absorb KVEA as we would another Spanish-language radio or newspaper." KMEX's track record, seems to justify Mr. Villanueva's apparent lack of concern.

Chicago

While Los Angeles may be able to support two fulltime tv stations, industry observers say the same may not be true for Chicago. Until recently Chicago was the home of two parttime Spanish-language stations, WCIU-TV and WBBS-TV.

On July 1, SIN established its first fulltime Chicago affiliate, WSNS-TV. The station's entrance led WBBS to bow out of the market and has put a strain on WCIU's ratings picture. According to fall, 1985, Strategy Research findings, WSNS already had garnered 28% of the prime-time total audience.

Network vs. independents

While WSNS is banking on SIN's programing and reputation to power it into the lead, Howard Shapiro, WCIU's president-general manager, is counting on audience loyalty and his station's 20-year history.

Like most independent station managers, Mr. Shapiro credits WCIU's longevity to local programing.

Seventy-two per cent of the station's local coverage is live, including 6 p.m. and 10 p.m. newscasts; a children's show; a self-help, call-in show that receives 80 calls a day, and a bilingual game show that receives an average 6,000 to 10,000 cards each week.

Reacting to his newest competitor, Mr. Shapiro says, "I don't think you can make money out of a fulltime Spanish station. If I thought you could I would've done it myself." WCIU brokers airtime to other minority programing as well as the Financial News Network.

According to Wayne Casa, president-general manager of WSNS, WCIU's checkered programing convinced SIN that Chicago was ripe for a fulltime Spanish station. "We always wanted to be in the Chicago market," SIN's John Pero says. "Although WCIU carried our programing, they were never considered part of the SIN network."

SIN has brought more quality programing to Chicago, increasing the number of Hispanics who are selecting Spanish-language tv over English-language fare, says Jorge Caballero, president, Jorge Caballero & Associates, a Chicago-based agency.

He also says advertisers were not paying attention to Chicago as a Hispanic market. "Maybe with SIN in the market they will," he says.

Unlike New York and Los Angeles, which at times compete with the primary Anglo stations, Mr. Casa says Chicago Hispanic tv always will be a secondary buy.

This allows the stations greater opportunity to do aggressive, local programing than in New York or Los Angeles, "where there's less preempting and more reliance on network fare."

Because Chicago is still in its infancy as a media center, he says, it will grow at a greater rate than the other markets.

Seventy-two per cent of Chicago station WCIU's local coverage is live.

Mr. Casa says SIN provides the financial leverage to purchase the best Spanish programing. He stresses the importance of screening shows to ensure his audience has a real alternative to English-language fare.

Although the network-to-local programing ratio stands at 85% to 15%, Mr. Casa says he hopes to achieve a 75% to 25% mix. Local production plans include a monthly health-oriented show, a public affairs program, musical variety show and a 10 p.m. newscast.

WSNS is committed to producing shows that reflect the life styles of American Hispanics, he says. "Whether they immigrated or were born here, the lives of Hispanics have changed and we must keep pace with these changes."

At this point Chicago's ability to support two Spanish-language stations remains in question. Mr. Shapiro says inadequate advertising revenue will result in "two losers and no winners."

Others, like Mr. Caballero, predict competition will focus greater visibility on the local Hispanic market, bringing more dollars to it.

FCC flags foreign ownership

SIN Television Network, usually highlighted for its stunning ability to command Hispanic media markets, is in the media spotlight for a reason network executives probably wish would remain in the shadows.

A matter of legalities has thrust SIN and seven of its affiliates, including New York's WXTV and Los Angeles' KMEX, into conflict with the Federal Communications Commission. Five of the affiliate stations are controlled by Spanish International Communications Corp. William Stiles, SIN's exec vp, says the seven stations' combined value is $100 million—"and that's a conservative estimate."

Rene Anselmo, SIN's president-chief executive officer, and the Azcarraga family, which controls Televisa, Mexico's major broadcasting company and a 75% shareholder in SIN, are SICC shareholders. The issue revolves around the long-standing relationship of Mr. Anselmo and the Azcarragas.

An FCC judge basically has ruled that Mr. Anselmo represents alien interests, despite his American citizenship, and that the combined Anselmo-Azcarraga shares in SICC violate the 20% alien ownership limit set by federal regulations. Two stations in Phoenix and San Francisco—ones in which Mr. Anselmo is a substantial shareholder but are not controlled by SICC or connected to the Azcarragas—have been made parties to the ruling.

SICC lawyers say the company will continue to operate its five stations and the ruling will be appealed. At press time, SICC was investigating some structural changes. Whether they will be enough for the FCC is undetermined. "But it is a problem SICC has to resolve," Mr. Stiles says. "SIN cannot resolve it."

Although the charges may have major implications for SIN's affiliates and their competitors, the Hispanic media and advertising community has rallied behind the network.

Referring to Televisa as "a monster," Jorge Caballero, president of Jorge Caballero & Associates, a Chicago-based Hispanic ad agency, stands behind SIN, saying it has opened up many employment opportunities and heightened recognition of Spanish-language media.

Jacqueline Da Costa, senior vp-media director, Ted Bates Advertising/New York, agrees wholeheartedly. "SIN has done a great service regardless of what is being charged," she says. "Their sales staff and station managers are real pioneers who have gotten to where they are by being tough. I think SIN's efforts should be supported in reaching a solution that doesn't hamper the network's progress."

"I think SIN's efforts should be supported in reaching a solution that doesn't hamper . . . progress."

Even competitors, who would benefit most by SIN being tripped by legal hamstrings, are standing by their rivals. "I don't think SIN was out to do anything intentionally wrong," says Carlos Barba, president, WNJU-TV, New York. "Unfortunately they thought they could run a broadcasting operation in the United States like they do in Mexico, where there is less government regulation."

He says he hopes the problem is resolved in SIN's favor, "because I would hate to wake up and not have any competition to drive me on to do better."

One of the general managers affected by the ruling has found a silver lining in the decision. The front-page coverage and concern generated by the FCC decision is proof of KMEX's crucial importance to the California community, says Daniel Villanueva, KMEX's president-general manager.

It's not only to whom you Market, but how you approach the Market.

Too often survey research is poorly implemented and executed. Findings understands the dangers inherent in poor quality research. This understanding derives from the fact that not only are we Hispanic but have the ability to communicate in the Hispanic "jerigonza." For instance, a grocery store could be called a Colmado, Bodega or Marqueta depending on which Hispanic nationality you are marketing to. Our ability is not limited to the fact that we speak the same language but includes the understanding of their behavioral patterns, idiosincracies and motivating factors, thus enabling us to "translate" the Hispanic reaction to a form understandable to the manufacturer/advertiser for use in future strategic plans. Global Satellite Network begins offering a three-hour weekly radio program featuring rock 'n' roll classics April 5. The new show, called "Reelin' In the Years," will be hosted by George Taylor Morris. The program will consist exclusively of '60s-era music.

Transtar Radio Networks adds a fourth, 24-hour live network to its present three nets May 1 with the introduction of "The Oldies Channel," a turnkey service that will concentrate on the mid and late '60s but will also feature some '50s and early '70s music. All the music, says the net, will be "carefully tested" so as not to cause tune-out among the primary target audience, men 25 to 54 and women in the same age range. ■

A weekly listing of tv programming that still has commercial availabilities open in the next few weeks.

"Throb," a weekly half-hour sitcom about a divorced mother in her 30s (Diana Canova) working in today's teen-oriented rock-music business, has been cleared in 19 of the top 20 markets, with syndicator Worldvision Enterprises, New York, projecting at least 100 markets by its fall start in barter syndication, in prime time or prime time access slots. Among outlets booked are three NBC-owned outlets (WNBC-TV, New York; KNBC, Los Angeles, and WMAQ, Chicago). Thirty-second ad units are going for $50,000. Co-produced by Procter & Gamble Productions and Taft Entertainment Group, "Throb" will have one national ad minute per week taken by Procter & Gamble, Cincinnati; the two remaining national minutes are being sold by Worldvision.

"The Jetsons," a weekly half-hour animated series from Worldvision Enterprises, New York, has about three units per week through the second quarter for $8,500 each. The show is cleared in 94 markets and gets a 6.5 to 6.8 rating for children ages 2 to 11. "Jetsons," which mostly airs in early fringe, has double runs in about 20% of its markets. Due to lower viewing levels, the show's ratings are expected to decline to 6 by the second quarter.

"The Funtastic World of Hanna-Barbera," also from Worldvision, has a few avails left in the second quarter for $9,500 each. The 1½-hour animated block will be expanded to two hours in mid-September. "Funtastic" is cleared in 75% of the country, or 96 markets, and airs Sunday mornings. The show has been delivering 9 to 10 ratings for children 2 to 11, a figure expected to drop to 7 to 8 by the second quarter. ■

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decidedly a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

ABC climbs the chart

ABC finally has something to write home about: "Dynasty" is picking up steam; "The Colbys" is building, and "The Monday Night Movie" finally won an outing. There's more, but the simple fact is ABC's vital signs are definitely improving. For a while, "Dynasty" seemed to exemplify the network's ailments this season. Now the worst appears to be behind. "Colbys" also had appeared destined for early failure. But suddenly that show has taken the No. 2 position on Thursdays at 9 p.m. (ET). A year ago, critics were assailing the network's plans to clone the show, but Lew Erlicht, the bounced programing boss, kept saying, "Just give us a 25 share and we'll be satisfied." The show may hit a 24 share next week.

CBS just pulled a hat trick with its Tuesday night movie. "One Terrific Guy" did not get a terrific number, but its 30 share was good enough. CBS has won Tuesday for the third straight critical week. ■

Plaque fighters amass ad artillery

Big Four jockeying for share

By LAURIE FREEMAN

The $1 billion dentifrice industry is in a lather, as most of its companies scramble to counter Procter & Gamble's heavy introductory spending for Crest Tartar-Control Formula paste and gel in pumps and tubes.

P&G apparently has managed to stop Colgate's surge and reestablish a more comfortable market-share lead.

And, although vastly outspent by competitors and losing share, Minnetonka is hoping to "out-innovate" them once again with an entirely new product form, a plaque-fighting chewing gum.

The new entry is slated for test-marketing under Minnetonka's Check-Up brand name.

At the same time, the big four toothpaste marketers have stepped up marketing efforts for their brands:

- P&G has launched a new tv campaign for its market-leading Crest brand, while continuing heavy promotion for the Crest Tartar-Control Formula line extension. P&G also introduced a gel version of Tartar-Control Formula (AA, Feb. 24).
- Colgate-Palmolive Co. is buying a heavy schedule for an innovative new tv spot, "WMFP," for its Colgate brand.
- Lever Bros. has broken a new campaign for Aim toothpaste, themed "We're aiming for zero cavities."
- Beecham Products has introduced a new "economy-size" pump dispenser, while positioning Aquafresh as the "triple-protection" plaque fighter.

Minnetonka shook up the market by introducing Check-Up, the first plaque-fighting toothpaste in a pump dispenser, three years ago (AA, May 9, '83). It took the four big toothpaste marketers two years to catch up and bring their own products to market—Beecham Products with Aqua-fresh, Colgate-Palmolive with Dentagard, Lever Bros. with Aim and P&G with Crest Tartar-Control Formula (AA, March 18). They have outgunned Minnetonka in advertising and promotion with combined ad spending of more than $100 million last year.

P&G alone spent an estimated

Johnston paved way for O'Donnell

Why JWT nursed ceo pick

By STEWART ALTER

The way J. Walter Thompson Co. tried manufacturing suspense in the search for client Burger King Corp.'s Herb is nothing compared with the buildup the agency is giving its own Joe.

The agency's process to disclose its new top executive—in which the losers are, oddly enough, paraded out one by one before the victor is proclaimed—is a shrewd strategy, agency sources say, to gain the agency the maximum amount of attention and publicity for the winner: Joseph O'Donnell, now exec vp-general manager of J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago.

The resignation last week of Walter O'Brien, 50, vice-chairman/director, multinational client services, passed over for the top spot, was not the surprise it seemed. "It has not been appropriate to announce his decision until now," said Don Johnston, chairman-ceo of both the parent JWT Group and the Thompson agency, the man whom Mr. O'Donnell is to succeed as ceo at the Thompson agency this week. "And Wally has handled this in a very manly and gracious fashion. He's been a real professional."

Sources say the back-to-front way in which the high drama is unfolding to its climax reflects not only a desire for maximum exposure for Mr. O'Donnell in the important New York ad community, but also Mr. Johnston's resolve that this succession be handled better than his own ascension to power.

Mr. O'Brien's departure follows by a week the nomination of Burt Manning, chairman-ceo of JWT/-USA, to the board of JWT Group, a move that tipped the fact he would not be Mr. Johnston's successor (AA, Feb. 24).

And while the actual events themselves are unexpected, they contrast greatly with those of 1974, when Mr. Johnston, a compromise candidate in a power struggle, was named to head an agency plagued by client departures, personnel unrest, money-losing subsidiaries and eroding profits.

"Don does remember what it was like and he has very carefully

Canada goes 'next door' with $14M campaign

New York—Canadian tourism gets a boost from a $14 million campaign breaking today in 36 U.S. markets. Three 60-second and three 30-second tv spots will run through June. Color spreads will run in national consumer magazines through August. The effort is themed "Come to the world next door." Camp Advertising, Toronto, created the campaign for Tourism Canada, a government agency.

Quaker oatmeal spots take health angle

Chicago—Quaker Oats Co. is testing a series of four health-related tv spots for its Quaker Instant Oats in Marion, Ind.; Midland, Tex., and Williamsport, Pa. Marcos exit plays havoc with Filipino newspaper, tv ads

By LYNNE REAVES

Manila—The revolution that drove Ferdinand Marcos from his 20-year rule and put Corazon Aquino into power has left the Philippines advertising industry in shambles.

Tv stations have been knocked off the air indefinitely, newspapers still are being effectively boycotted by readers and advertisers and some advertising agencies may suffer long-term effects from their connections with the Marcos regime.

As Coca-Cola, with its Marcos links, kept a low profile, the first tv spot to air following Mrs. Aquino's ascension to power was a Pepsi-Cola call to its "New generation."

Observing recent events, Teddy Jurado, president, Assn. of Accredited Advertising Agencies, said, "The advertising industry is in disarray. Media placement on tv is especially a problem. We will be having emergency meetings to decide what to do."

"We estimate that during the four days of the actual revolution, from Saturday through Tuesday, advertising dropped by 75% nationwide," said Don Dillon, president of McCann-Erickson here.

"Advertisers did not want to be seen this time. They thought it was inappropriate. Just about the only ads left running were movie ads," he added.

Advertisers who did not voluntarily withdraw from the five tv channels quickly had it done for them as rebel troops took over studios and knocked out transmitters.

Government-owned Channel 4 went off the air, but resumed broadcasting four hours later with a skeleton staff of Mrs. Aquino's backers at the anchor desk.

Channel 4 programing remained chaotic, but 22 hours after Mr. Marcos left the country the "new Channel 4" aired its first commercial. With great fanfare, the announcers introduced the commercial—appropriately, the Pepsi-Cola "New generation" spot.

"We met with the Pepsi people the night before and decided to

JWT's O'Donnell intro 'shrewd' 1
The way J. Walter Thompson Co. tried manufacturing suspense for client Burger King Corp.'s Herb is nothing compared with what the agency is giving Joseph O'Donnell. The agency's process to disclose its new top executive—in which the losers are paraded out one by one before the victor is proclaimed—is a shrewd strategy to gain the agency maximum publicity for the winner.

Minis aside, NBC strong 3
CBS may have won both clashes of the miniseries titans during the February sweeps but NBC still will win the seasonlong Nielsen ratings war. Only a total prime time ratings collapse between now and April 20 could prevent the "peacock network" from snaring its first seasonlong household ratings win in years.

Seven-Up lines up juice 4
Seven-Up Co. finally has an answer to the juice-based soft-drink segment, which for nearly two years has been slicing away at its dominant share of the lemon-lime market.

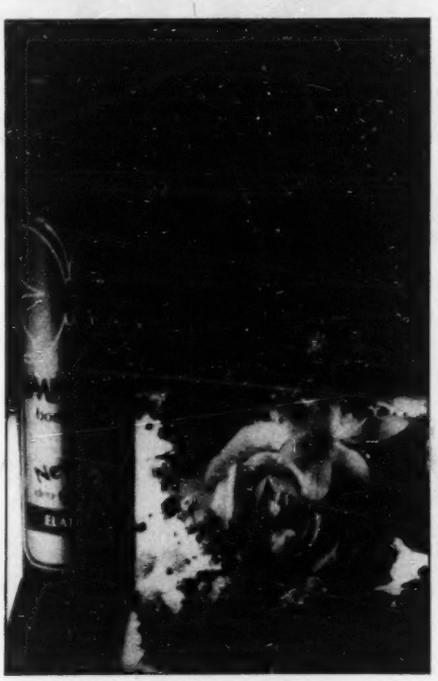
DFS, Dorland find a way 6
The agreement by Dancer Fitzgerald Sample and Dorland Advertising to create DFS Dorland Worldwide, a $1.2 billion agency, meets the needs of both agencies with a novel approach to questions that haunt agency mergers the world over.

Within the Reagan line 12
Daniel Oliver, the conservative Republican slated by the White House to be the next chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, cruised through a Senate confirmation hearing last week without straying from Reagan policy on key advertising issues.

Pen makers get ball rolling 35
The nation's leading pen companies are writing a new chapter in their marketing battles as they introduce a new generation of rolling-ball pens. In the latest moves to dominate the $907 million, 3.5 billion-unit category, four companies in spring will bring out products in the hottest segment of the field.

C-E shows overseas losses 43
Interpublic Group of Cos. lost more than $6 million on Campbell-Ewald International's overseas operations from 1981 to 1984, according to a public filing on the formation of Lowe Marschalk Worldwide in the U.K.

War toys spark conflict 44
They are known as action figures, superheroes or war toys, depending on one's point of view. But whatever they're called, they are generating record sales for the toy industry. Those numbers have attracted the attention of some who question the morality of producing such toys for and marketing them to the very young.



Lever Bros. 'Elated' 46
Trying to revive body sprays and expand its beauty-aids business, Lever Bros. is introducing a new deodorant/fragrance, Elation. Elation will be part of the Impulse body spray line launched in 1982, when body sprays were a promising new category.

Jim Beam ads off beaten path 67
From the looks of its new campaign, James B. Beam Distilling Co. would rather change while it's ahead than hang on to a traditional image whose appeal is fading. While other leading bourbon marketers continue to wrap their brands in down-home Americana, new Beam ads, themed "Now you've got everything but the Jim Beam," stress the product's versatility by prominently displaying mixing options, such as tonic and orange juice.

Frenzy on Fleet Street 40
In a special report, Advertising Age examines the newspaper industry in the U.K., where a new tabloid called Today is scheduled to be launched this week. The newspaper is causing a sensation in London publishing circles, where executives are speculating that Today could change the way Fleet Street operates. And while newspaper moguls and print union officials ponder the long-term effects of Today on the newspaper industry, advertising and marketing executives are wondering about changes in newspaper advertising rates. Since news of Today hit the streets, a handful of imitators has declared plans to inaugurate its own Today-style national newspapers. See Page 41.

While Keye/Donna/Pearlstein has yet to achieve the national prominence enjoyed by a handful of West Coast agencies such as Chiat/Day, Los Angeles, and Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco (formerly an Ogilvy & Mather office), it has been steadily gaining momentum by delivering excellent (and sometimes brilliant) creative work. It also has a reputation for sound, intelligent management.

Many view the direct mail that fills their mailboxes and the telemarketing calls that ring at all hours as an invasion of their privacy. As many states respond to these beliefs, direct marketers work to maintain their right to pursue business in an unrestricted environment, a business that generates about $40 million in sales of goods and services, according to the Direct Marketing Assn. Special Report looks at the privacy issue and some companies' direct-marketing tactics.

Beauty market delays scents

By PAT SLOAN

Boca Raton, Fla.—After a year of little industry growth, at least five major beauty marketers are considering delaying 1986 fragrance introductions until 1987 and focusing efforts instead on existing fragrances and other new-product areas.

Executives at the annual Cosmetic, Toiletry & Fragrance Assn. meeting here also expressed concern about the growth of counterfeit goods and discussed how to improve both the public's and government's perception of the value of personal-care products.

A glut of new fragrances, accompanied by constant dollar annual growth of only 2% to 3% in the category for the past few years, may

General Motors' print media rate-busting now has other auto makers talking tough.

They expect any concessions or volume discount rates won by GM to be offered to them as well. They predict the rate assault will spread to tv, radio, outdoor and other media. And they aren't above taking a poke at GM for joining the game late.

"We've been tough on magazine rates for a couple of years and it'll get worse before it gets better," said Louis Lataif, vp-sales operations for Ford Motor Co. Ford has cut several magazines from its buy list for refusing its demands and has increased buys in books that coop-

DFS wins almond account

California Almond Growers Exchange, Sacramento, Cal., has hired Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, San Francisco, to replace its agency of 28 years, Busse & Cummins, San Francisco, on its $8 million account. The marketer of Blue Diamond brand almonds chose DFS in a review involving the incumbent, Lowe Marschalk, McCann-Erickson, Hal Riney & Partners, all San Francisco, and Needham Harper Worldwide, Los Angeles. DFS, Dorland find creative solution

Unique $75 million deal tries to avoid conflicts

By STEWART ALTER and LAUREL WENTZ

The agreement by Dancer Fitzgerald Sample and Dorland Advertising to create DFS Dorland Worldwide, a $1.2 billion agency, solves the needs of both agencies with a novel approach to questions that haunt agency mergers the world over.

Among those questions: How can agency principals sell substantial ownership positions without losing control? And how can agencies own more than one network and still avoid client conflict problems?

Last week's agreement allows New York-based DFS and London-based Dorland to go international. It provides Dorland's parent, Saatchi & Saatchi Co., with a second worldwide agency network to complement its Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide. And it does so through a binding financial arrangement that hedges ownership of the new agency—thus avoiding client-conflict problems with other Saatchi agencies.

Dorland, through Saatchi, will lend $75 million to a new company, DFS Management, which in turn will buy all shares held by DFS' 210 stockholders, including those held by the five top DFS executives.

These executives will retain control of DFS by controlling DFS Management. But while they will pay interest on the loan, they will not repay the principal.

The interest is Dorland's only financial gain. It's also a tax-deductible business expense for DFS—which is, in effect, on permanent loan to its own management.

Like something out of "Alice in Wonderland," these executives own the company but they don't, since they can never repay the loan. The only possible owner is Dorland, which can claim the agency at any time, but which says it won't.

"It is not a phased acquisition," said Jack Rubins, 54, Dorland's ceo and deputy chairman of the new network. "It is exactly what we are describing. We do have an option to acquire, but it is not our intention to exercise that option."

Mr. Rubins described this as "a legal and worldwide way of ensuring separateness." The agencies considered but rejected an autonomy agreement as not being "bulletproof" enough, he said. "This is far more binding than any other form we could find."

The agreement is subject to approval from the U.S., U.K. and DFS' shareholders.

Dorland's option to buy is necessary, the partners believe, because it creates the interlocking financial link that DFS and Dorland believe is required to make the network successful. Observers see no reason why that option wouldn't be executed if client conflicts were no longer a concern.

The conflict issue reportedly was compounded by the fact that all of Saatchi's agencies have auto accounts and by the strict conflict policies of Procter & Gamble, both a DFS and Saatchi client.

P&G also was said to be concerned about having too much of its billings concentrated in one agency company.

The board of directors of the newly formed DFS Dorland Worldwide (appearing clockwise, beginning at lower left): Chairman Stuart Upson, Robert Kennedy, Gary Susnjara, Michael Bungey, William Vickery, Michael Geraghty, Peter McSpadden and Jack Rubins.

"Procter & Gamble is very sticky about conflicts," said analyst Jim Dougherty of Ebertstadt Fleming, New York, a onetime P&G employe who has followed both P&G and agency stocks. "If you want their business, you play by their rules."

But whether Dorland and DFS have danced effectively around the client-conflict issue remains to be seen.

One agency observer likened the deal to saying, "Don't raise the bridge, lower the river."

Emma Hill, an analyst at Wertheim & Co., New York, compared it to following "the letter of the law but not the intent of the law." Mr. Rubins commented, "If there was concern, there can't be now. They [DFS] are not owned by us [Dorland]. We haven't gone to these lengths for the fun of it."

Peter McSpadden, 55, president of DFS Dorland as he has been of DFS, said, "There have been discussions with each of our clients. They've been kept up-to-date, and as far as we know, they're all accepting."

The fact that client conflicts aren't as cut-and-dried as they once were lends strength to DFS Dorland's efforts. A wave of client-side mergers has for now left intact client-agency relationships that might have been vetoed before. And arrangements such as The Interpublic Group of Cos. with its agencies, and The Ogilvy Group, with Scali, McCabe, Sloves, have demonstrated success in this area.

London analysts have given the deal high marks. "Saatchi will have the ability to avoid potential conflicts internationally in the same way as they do in the U.K. now, where Saatchi handles Nissan and Dorland handles Austin Rover," said Richard Dale of the James Capel brokerage house.

DFS Dorland's main offices are DFS ($876 million in 1985 billings), Dorland ($210 million) and Fortune Communication Holdings in Australia ($87 million).

DFS was not able to succeed internationally by itself, Mr. McSpadden said: "We started too late. As a private company, our pockets were not deep enough to make the investments required when we became involved. And there were no major clients to take us around the world."

Besides making DFS international, the deal also resolves questions about the agency's future. Those had revolved around the reportedly large block of stock owned by Stuart Upson, 60, DFS' chairman who is now also chairman of DFS Dorland.

While he and the other four top DFS officers will be tied into five-year employment contracts, he, like everyone else, will be able to sell his DFS Dorland stock upon completion of the deal.

Besides Messrs. Upson and McSpadden, the five top DFS officers include William Vickery, 50, international director; Robert Kennedy, 44, chief financial officer, and Gary Susnjara, 44, director of North American operations. The eight-member DFS Dorland board also includes, from Dorland, Mr. Rubins; Michael Bungey, 45, director-European operations, and Michael Geraghty, 51, director-corporate development.

Saatchi, a public company, will provide the $75 million from its own existing funds.

That price is figured on results from DFS' fiscal year, ended Aug. 31, 1985, in which its billings were $868 million, its pretax profits $17.6 million and net tangible assets $34.7 million.

While that makes the price about two times book value, it will be higher after Dorland makes a further payment in 1991. That payment to shareholders will be the positive difference between what DFS earns in the next five years and $41 million, an $8.2 million per year average that is actually lower than what the agency earns now.

Under general accounting principles both in the U.S. and the U.K., Saatchi can consolidate DFS' assets and earnings into its own financial statements, but it may not exercise that option, sources indicate.#

Fleet Street frenzy

Eddy Shah's 'Today' shakes up U.K.

Tabloid could spell new era for industry

Maverick publisher Eddy Shah plans to shake up U.K. newspapers this month with the debut of Today. A recent prototype of the new tabloid featured the Super Bowl.

By LAUREL WENTZ

LONDON—Fleet Street, headquarters of the U.K. newspaper industry, will never be the same after this week.

On March 4, upstart publisher Eddy Shah will launch the much-anticipated first edition of his new daily tabloid, Today (AA, Oct. 15).

The newspaper uses color lavishly and offers ad rates that are 75% less than most of its competitors. Today is also the first U.K. daily to be produced with computerized printing technology and is free of the powerful unions that have stymied other newspapers.

If Mr. Shah's newspaper succeeds—and U.S. international agency heads are betting that it will—it could spell the beginning of a new era for Fleet Street. Some observers believe U.K. newspapers will become profitable enterprises that are as attractive to investors as U.S. newspapers.

New investors

In the past, investors like Atlantic Richfield Co., which owned the Observer until the early 1980s, have had to pull out of Fleet Street after mounting losses. But now, global media magnate Rupert Murdoch and Canadian industrialist Conrad Black have reversed the process and are investing heavily.

"Inevitably, the so-called new technology finally caught up with us," said Roy Langridge, assistant chief executive at Ted Bates Holdings. "Rupert Murdoch said the other day that it had been around for 35 years in the U.S. It had to come sometime, and Shah is the catalyst. He's the man who forced the pace."

Until now, there has been little competition on Fleet Street—a five-block stretch in the center of London where most of the U.K.'s national newspapers are published. This is so even though London has nine national morning papers with circulations ranging from 230,000 for the Financial Times to more than 4 million for the downmarket Sun tabloid.

But most of the papers either lose money or struggle to break even because of huge operating costs, bloated payrolls and labor-union strife.

Sources say Mr. Shah is uniquely qualified to break with tradition. As the publisher of a thriving group of free weeklies—newspapers given away to readers and supported solely by advertising—he is an outsider, unaffected by decades of union bullying.

He is also the only person to successfully fight the printers' unions, emerging victorious two years ago from a bitter and sometimes violent strike at his weeklies. As a result, he has attained a rare credibility in the newspaper industry that has allowed him to raise $24 million to finance Today from investors who might otherwise be wary of tangling with the unions.

As a result of Today, other U.K. newspaper groups are going ahead with plans to cut their staffs and update their printing facilities, plans that have been delayed by inflexible trade unions. Also, several ailing newspapers have recently been taken over by bottom-line minded entrepreneurs who are anxious to follow Mr. Shah's lead.

Among those leading the way to sweeping change is Mr. Murdoch, owner of the U.K.'s largest national newspaper group, News International.

Mr. Murdoch has already built a $140 million plant equipped with modern printing technology three miles from Fleet Street in Wapping, ostensibly to publish new titles he has yet to launch. The move angered print unions, whose members refused to consider a nonstrike agreement and other concessions Mr. Murdoch wanted for the new plant.

Union calls strike

When he insisted, the 5,500 print union members at Mr. Murdoch's Times, Sunday Times, Sun and News of the World went on strike in late January.

To the industry's surprise, Mr. Murdoch fired all 5,500 workers and moved the four titles into the Wapping plant, which has elaborate security systems.

The four newspapers resumed publication at Wapping, where they were produced by members of the single union not opposed to introduction of modern technology, the Electrical, Electronics, Telecommunications & Plumbing Union, the same group that puts out Today.

The strike continued, but it failed to halt publication of the newspapers. After the first week, Mr. Murdoch's erratic, makeshift distribution system improved.

"The union hasn't scored many points," said Derek Terrington, an analyst at London stockbroker Grieveson Grant. "So far, Murdoch is leading about 50 points to 2."

Elsewhere on Fleet Street, Czech-born publisher Robert Maxwell, who bought the Mirror Group newspapers in 1984, has frequently threatened to shut down

New paper expected to spark ad competition

LONDON—While newspaper moguls and print union officials ponder what long-term effects Eddy Shah's new tabloid Today will have on the U.K. newspaper industry, marketing and ad agency executives are wondering about newspaper ad rates.

Because Today is produced with computerized printing equipment by substantially fewer staffers than other Fleet Street newspapers, it can offer ad rates that are 75% lower than its competitors.

A b&w page in Today costs $6,670, compared with about $25,375 for the same ad in the Daily Express or other tabloids, said Ron Brown, Today's advertising sales manager.

The price gap is even wider for a color page. Such an ad costs $13,900 in Today, while the other tabs charge as much as $63,800, he said. However, agency media directors pointed out that most advertisers are able to negotiate sizable discounts on the older newspapers' rate cards.

"Fleet Street is a very volatile commodity market," said Stewart Butterfield, media director for McCann-Erickson. "The rate card is irrelevant to most buyers." Even so, he added, "There will be more competition [because of Today]."

Rumors abound of price wars on Fleet Street, but so far no newspapers have announced they will slash prices.

"You can only get so much advertising into his paper," said Ray Morgan, director of Ray Morgan & Partners, an independent media buyer. "If papers start cutting rates madly, they will only be cutting each others' throats. But there will be more competition between the major titles."

Mr. Morgan and other industry experts agreed that the inexpensive and colorful ads offered by Today could lure some major advertisers, such as retailers, back to newspapers.

"It will give newspapers a chance to fight back for the ground lost to television," Mr. Morgan said.

Newspaper advertising in the U.K. totals about $1 billion a year and is increasing by about 9% annually, according to the U.K. Advertising Assn.

Mr. Shah, for his part, appeared confident that he will come out on top.

He claimed that in a market where most of the U.K.'s nine national dailies and eight Sunday newspapers lose money year after year, Today will turn a profit in its first year.

He also said his newspaper could make a profit of $30 million a year with a circulation of 1.5 million and a maximum of 37.5% of the paper devoted to ads.

For weekday issues, the newspaper will print 44 pages, including 16 in color, and on Sunday Today will run 98 pages.

Today's ad pages already are sold out for the first week of publication and a total of $13 million in advertising already has been sold for the first nine months, Mr. Brown said.

To promote Today, Mr. Shah is launching a $9 million ad campaign this week via Wight Collins Rutherford Scott.

The tv campaign features commercials starring dancer Rudolf Nureyev and famine fund-raiser Bob Geldof, a rock musician and member of the U.K. rock group the Boomtown Rats. Mr. Geldof organized last year's Live Aid concert in the U.S. and the U.K. to raise money for Ethiopian famine relief.

To meet the threat of Today, the U.K.'s five major newspaper groups are expected to start their own multi-million-dollar advertising campaigns, possibly in early April.

Jim Smith, group account director at WCRS, estimated that Mr. Shah's rivals will spend a total of up to $19 million in advertising to combat Today.

He said he expected Mr. Murdoch's News International to spend $4.5 million via Saatchi and Saatchi and that equal amounts will be spent by Robert Maxwell's Mirror Group and by the Express Group.

The remainder will be spent by the Guardian and the Daily Telegraph, he said.■—L.W.

Imitation newspapers gear up for launch in wake of 'Today'

By LAUREL WENTZ

LONDON—If imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, Eddy Shah should be blushing.

Since Mr. Shah announced plans to launch Today, a handful of would-be imitators, including Rupert Murdoch, have declared plans to start their own Shah-style national newspapers during the next year.

To compete with Mr. Shah, both Mr. Murdoch and Robert Maxwell, owner of the Mirror Group of newspapers, have announced new dailies for this spring, even though Mr. Murdoch already has four newspapers in the U.K. and Mr. Maxwell has three.

Both publishers initially said they would start evening papers in March, but those plans have changed. London has only one evening paper, the London Standard.

Instead, Mr. Maxwell announced he will introduce another new morning daily, to be called Good Day, and Mr. Murdoch has put his London Post on the back burner.

Observers speculated that both publishers changed their plans because research indicates the afternoon newspaper market is dwindling significantly.

"Gross circulation [of afternoon papers] has dropped by about 2 million [in the 1960s] to 500,000 to 600,000 now," said Stewart Butterfield, McCann-Erickson's media director here. "Whether there is enough advertising for two or three competitors, I doubt."

Also, the U.K.'s evening press tends to be regional. The London morning dailies are transported during the night, enabling them to cover the 600-mile area needed for national distribution.

Mr. Murdoch's evening paper project may have been a ploy to enable him to gear up his new printing plant to print existing titles, media insiders said.

"The Post always seemed slightly on the wrong side of reality," said a newspaper analyst. "It seemed to be part of a strategy [to move production] rather than part of a publishing plan."

Although still seven months off, another newspaper project that is intriguing U.K. publishing and advertising circles is a new upmarket daily conceived by two Fleet Street veterans with guidance from Saatchi & Saatchi.

Andreas Whittam Smith, former city editor of the Daily Telegraph, and Douglas Long, chief executive officer of the Mirror Group until Mr. Maxwell bought it last year, retained Saatchi to research readership and ad potential for the as-yet-unnamed daily and help set up a rate card. Saatchi also will handle the $6 million ad budget for the early October launch.

Like Mr. Shah, Mr. Whittam Smith has been influenced by USA Today.

"One thing USA Today has absorbed is that readers get their primary news from tv, and newspapers have to complement it," Mr. Whittam Smith said. "In Fleet Street, papers are put together by people who don't watch tv."

He said telephone interviews are being done to research six possible newspaper names: Arena, Chronicle, Examiner, Independent, Nation and 24 Hours.

The upmarket readership Mr. Whittam Smith is targeting with the six-day-a-week, 24-page newspaper (17 pages of editorial and four color pages) is the only growing segment of the British newspaper industry, sources contended.

"The Times is up 64% in circulation since 1981 and the Guardian by 25%," said Adrian O'Neill, advertising and marketing director of the newspaper Mr. Whittam Smith is planning.

The launch would be the first for an upscale national daily since 1900, Mr. O'Neill said.

"This market has been frozen in time by the unions," said Mr. Whittam Smith. "And Fleet Street management is largely concerned with marshaling 3,000 to 4,000 printers, an industrial relations nightmare. They don't take any notice of the product or marketing or financial control."

Mr. Whittam Smith's paper, like Today, will skirt that problem by using computerized production methods.

Other newspaper projects are springing up, but few have found solid financial backing.

Former Fleet Street editor Clive Thornton periodically announces plans for a new Sunday newspaper, and an editor of the Irish independent newspaper group is testing reactions from financial backers to an entertainment-oriented Sunday tabloid tentatively called the Sunday Globe.#

New era

the Mirror, the Sunday Mirror and Sunday People newspapers in the face of union intransigence.

Analysts estimate the Mirror Group lost $30 million to $42 million in 1985, including $9 million in August alone when publication was suspended for 12 days while Mr. Maxwell battled the unions.

The circulation of the Mirror Group's three papers has dropped steadily since Mr. Maxwell took over and now hovers around 3 million each for the Mirror, the Sunday Mirror and Sunday People.

To slash costs, Mr. Maxwell in December won an unprecedented union agreement allowing him to cut 2,000 of the heavily overstaffed Mirror Group's 6,000 jobs in 1986.

Elsewhere on Fleet Street, the Express Group, whose publications include the Express and the Daily Express, succumbed in October to a $475 million takeover bid by United Newspapers, which owns provincial newspapers here and trade publications in the U.K. and the U.S.

UN reportedly discovered $22.5 million worth of new equipment in the Express Bldg. that had not even been unwrapped due to union opposition to its use. David Stevens, UN's chairman, has announced plans to cut 2,500 of the Express Group's 6,800 jobs during the next year and up to 1,000 more in the future.

Mr. Terrington said job cuts on Fleet Street are expected to save the U.K.'s newspaper groups millions and put them on the road to financial health in 1986.

"Labor costs of $150 million to $180 million per year will be taken out of Fleet Street starting the second half of 1986," he said. "And hopefully new management will make all the difference, especially at the Daily Telegraph."

The conservative Daily Telegraph, the last family-owned newspaper on Fleet Street and once one of the most profitable, raised $157 million in June to buy modern equipment and make layoff payments of up to $65,000 per worker to eliminate hundreds of superfluous jobs. But with advertising revenue and circulation falling throughout 1985, the 130-year-old Daily Telegraph could not generate enough cash to pay its debts.

In December, the paper announced a $23.7 million pretax loss for the half year, and Canadian industrialist Conrad Black quickly acquired majority ownership of the daily and Sunday Telegraph in a $43 million refinancing package.

Mr. Black had acquired a 15% share in the paper in June for $14 million. Although he has been portrayed in the U.K. press as a journalist-hating invader, he is expected to give the Daily Telegraph's septuagenarian management a much-needed shakeup.#

What they say about Shah's new venture

Can Eddy Shah succeed? Will the launch of his new morning tabloid Today be the catalyst that turns around the U.K.'s ailing newspaper industry? ADVERTISING AGE asked the experts. Here are their responses:

Derek Terrington, newspaper and publishing analyst, Grieveson, Grant & Co.:

"He's got a hard job on hand. This market has got some very strong established brands that have been around since the turn of the century. People are very conservative about their newspapers. People will sample it at the beginning, then possibly the circulation will go down. He's got a very hard marketing job ahead.

CAROLINE MARLAND

DEREK TERRINGTON

"He's not exactly asking a lot [for ads]. On a continuing basis, the question is, will there be more checks [from advertisers]?"

Ray Morgan, director of Ray Morgan & Partners, media buyers:

"The relatively small circulation—1.5 million—won't in itself take Fleet Street apart at the seams. It's the dramatic impact Shah's had on people like Rupert Murdoch and Robert Maxwell, who are now busily reorganizing their labor relations. I think Shah has been quite a catalyst. He's made Murdoch confident enough to make a fairly preemptive move [firing 5,500 print workers].

"Shah is able to produce a viable newspaper at a fraction—maybe 20%—of the cost of producing traditional newspapers. I think as a marketing exercise we've yet to see how it looks, but as a piece of factory planning it looks extraordinarily successful."

Caroline Marland, advertising director of the Guardian:

"Shah is an amazing catalyst on Fleet Street. At least another six papers are on the tracks, ready to go. Some won't survive. I think Shah will.

He has terrific good will from the advertising agencies. It will be interesting to see how far that good will extends if everything is not right from the very beginning—there are some rumors that his computer setup isn't all it should be.

"Shah has escalated what I think would have taken another 10 years on Fleet Street. We've all had to react to that. He's like the emperor who had no clothes. Shah has no product yet, but everyone is scared as hell of him."

Roy Langridge, assistant chief executive of Ted Bates Holdings:

"Shah's is an extremely bold and very imaginative venture. I think it will do a hell of a lot to revitalize the market—newspapers have been uninteresting as media. He'll have to fight very hard when the initial euphoria wears off, but I think he'll be a fixture in the marketplace. He won't have an easy ride, but I think there is no question he'll succeed."#

This data has been provided by Media Records for exclusive publication in Advertising Age and may not be reprinted or published in any form without explicit permission from Media Records. All newspapers represented are subscribers to Media Records. For those newspapers that subscribe to Media Records National Advertising Reporting Service, Total Advertising data shown has been supplied by the publisher to Media Records and included in this compilation. All publisher supplied figures are converted to MRCS/SAU inches by Media Records. These newspapers are indicated with an asterisk (*).

REPORTING METHODOLOGY

Media Records continues to measure in linage but due to the introduction of the SAU 6 column format Media Records has designed and developed a methodology with the approval of our subscribers, the INAME Measurements Committee, The ANPA/NAB Working Committee, The AAAA Newspaper Committee, and other industry groups.

The approved methodology is titled The Media Records Conversion System (MRCS) and is based upon the printed page area of each product of the newspaper and is a five step approach as follows:

1. Measure Printed Page.....
   Width and Depth in Inches.
2. Determine Square Inches of Page.....
   Multiply Width by Depth Inches.
3. Determine the Number of SAU Inches of Page.....
   Divide the Square Inches by 2.0625 (SAU Inches).
4. Measure the Total Lines of the Page.....
   Multiply Column Depth Agate Lines by the Number of Columns on the Page.
5. Determine the Factor for Converting Measured Lines to Reported SAU Inches.....

Riding high at Keye

While Keye/Donna/Pearlstein has yet to achieve the national prominence enjoyed by a handful of West Coast agencies such as Chiat/Day, Los Angeles, and Hal Riney & Partners, it has been steadily gaining momentum by delivering excellent (and sometimes brilliant) creative work. These qualities, and K/D/P's independent status, have made the agency a prime acquisition target. See Page 4.

Under it all in London

Travelers on London's subway system are seeing a remarkable transformation in the bowels of the earth. London Underground Ltd. is spending about $120 million on revamping 140 stations in a network that opened in 1863.

Dark, dingy and soulless stations are being given more than just a dab of paint, as the aim of this modernization program is to make the daily journeys of 2 million passengers more pleasant by giving stations character and identity.

The London Underground is following a well trodden path. In the 1930s, the London subway system set new standards both in poster advertising and in subway station design. See Page 52.

Special Report—Direct Marketing

Many view the direct mail that fills their mailboxes and the telemarketing calls that ring at all hours as an invasion of their privacy. As many states respond to these beliefs, direct marketers work to maintain their right to pursue business in an unrestricted environment, a business that generates about $40 million in sales of goods and services, according to the Direct Marketing Assn. This issue and others are examined, beginning on Page 15.

Bozell wins Merrill

NEW YORK—Merrill Lynch & Co. has moved its $45 million general advertising and direct-response account to Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt from Young & Rubicam. BJK&E last year picked up Merrill's $5 million Unit Trust investment group from Y&R. The switch is tinged with controversy, because William Appelman, the senior vp-group creative director at Y&R heading up the creative attempts to save the business, announced he was leaving to join BJK&E in the new post of exec vp-executive creative director on the same day Merrill announced the switch. N W Ayer, Dancer Fitzgerald Sample and Grey Advertising also vied for the account.

B&S gets Magnavox

KNOXVILLE, TENN.—N.A.P. Consumer Electronics Corp. has chosen Backer & Spielvogel, New York, for its estimated $10 million Magnavox account. Doyle Dane Bernbach previously handled (AA, March 3). The company continues a review for its Sylvania and Philco brands. DDB is the incumbent on Sylvania; Davis-Newman-Payne here and Infantino Corea & Enterprises, Rochester, N.Y., handle Philco.

Burnett drops Fisher Nut

CHICAGO—Leo Burnett USA this week resigned Beatrice Cos.' approximately $4 million Fisher Nut account due to "business philosophy differences." Separately, Burnett exec vp Bob Barocci has resigned to pursue other opportunities. Last fall, Mr. Barocci was moved from president of Leo Burnett International to exec vp at the parent company, overseeing new-business development and corporate relations (AA, Sept. 30).

Healthy chicken pitch

MIAMI—Burger King Corp.'s introductory network tv ad thrust for Chicken Tenders will feature a quality and health-oriented pitch themed "Ain't nothing like the real thing." BK will stress the 100% breast meat content of its finger-food product and pitch its frying of Chicken Tenders in vegetable oil. BK delayed the national rollout (AA, Nov. 18, et seq.) until April to ensure adequate supplies, said vp-marketing Tom Sawyer. J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, handles.

New life for AD/SAT

NEW YORK—British Printing & Communication Corp., a unit of Robert Maxwell's Pergamon Press Ltd., has acquired the assets and the name of AD/SAT Inc. from a joint venture of Robert Wold Co., Los Angeles, and Mitsui & Co. USA, the U.S. unit of Mitsui, Tokyo. The acquisition brightens prospects that the satellite transmission service for newspaper ad materials will finally get off the ground after more than a year of planning and efforts to get financing. N.S. (Buddy) Hayden remains AD/SAT president, but the company will move here from Los Angeles.

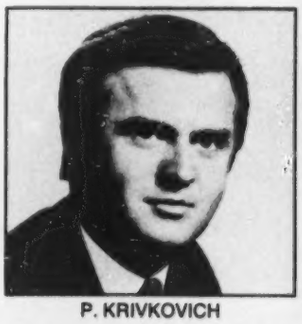
Whatever happened to the commercial "zapping" uproar? General Foods and others were ready to spend millions researching implications for viewership in the remote-control age. Are you still concerned about zapping?



P. KRIVKOVICH

Peter Krivkovich, president, Cramer-Krasselt, Chicago: "Zapping isn't a major problem. It seems that vcr owners want the security of having taped a program, more than actually wanting to watch it. It tends to be more of enjoying the mechanics of a new gadget. The vcr itself presents a larger problem by offering a strong alternative to commercial television. Viewing of any program, no matter how it was acquired, may diminish the chance of exposing consumers to an advertising message."

A. SYLVESTER

Alice Sylvester, associate director-media research, J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago: "We continue to be completely involved in the issue in that it brought our attention back to the broader question of commercial inattentiveness. Maybe we got a little soft. What we have to do as an industry is raise the CDI [category development index] for people to watch commercials. Better commercials and public awareness of better commercials will raise the general interest in watching them."

G. WILLHOFT

Gene Willhoft, vp-director of media services, Ally & Gargano, New York: "Yes, we're concerned, even though our recent analysis of Nielsen information suggests for now the problem is not as severe as many may think. . .Our answer has been to pressure the networks and local stations for first positions within commercial pods. And with our creative product, we feel if we can catch viewers' attention for a few seconds, we're likely to hold them for the duration of the spot."

M. FLATLIE

Mary Flatlie, senior vp-media director, J. Walter Thompson/West, Los Angeles: "We're all still concerned about zapping, but it has taken on some new turns. When someone is sitting in front of the television set and is switching channels, chances are that person is going to switch to another commercial. The thing that has us all concerned is what we call 'zipping' these days. That's when the person is in front of the vcr and can fast-forward through the commercials. In many instances, that potential commercial exposure is lost."

S. SEGAL

Stephen Segal, senior vp-media director, Lowe Marschalk, New York: "Zapping may only be a real problem in the future. The great number of tv homes have no remote control and cannot easily zap. In fact, less than 10% of program audiences switch channels during programs. Zapping will probably, however, increase, and networks may eventually have to discourage this by varying lengths of commercial pods, or make programs more interesting."

ON THE DIAL

Scheduled radio specials and new programs or syndicated services.

ABC Radio Networks, New York, will begin offering affiliates of all six of its networks a new feed of historic audio cuts that are bound to jog the memories and tweak the hearts of baby-boomers everywhere. Called "Audio Datebook," the new feed has drawn extensively on the archives of ABC News to come up with classic actualities from events such as Ed Sullivan introducing the Beatles, men landing on the moon and Woodstock.

United Stations Networks, New York, takes its formerly summer-only "Hot Rocks" series to weekly frequency starting April 5 with a show featuring the music and the thoughts of John Cougar Mellencamp. At present, United plans to offer the series weekly to affiliates through the end of the year. At press time, the first offering had cleared US affiliates in 80% of the top 173 Arbitron-defined markets.

Westwood One Radio Networks, Los Angeles, will kick off a new series called "BBC Classic Concerts" on April 14 with a concert taped live at the BBC's Paris Theater in London in April, 1971, featuring Led Zeppelin. After the debut show, the series will air every fourth week as an addition to Westwood's "In Concert" show, and will feature classic performances by such supergroups as Pink Floyd, the Faces, Deep Purple, Traffic, the Kinks, Rod Stewart, Jeff Beck and the Police. Clearance numbers were not available at press time.

Ed Salamon (l.), exec vp of programing for United Stations Networks, talks with John Cougar Mellencamp.

United Stations Networks, New York, will provide volunteer coverage of the Hands Across America hunger relief project, scheduled for May 25. USN will provide daily, 60-second news updates narrated by various celebrities connected with the project beginning April 1. The coverage will culminate with a three-hour special, produced with Coca Cola USA, that will cover the event itself on May 25. Proceeds from the sale of advertising time will be forwarded to Hands Across America and the USA for Africa Foundation. ■

TV AVAILS

A weekly listing of tv programing that still has commercial availabilities open in the next few weeks.

"Star Games," produced by Viacom Enterprises, has "some avails" through the rest of this quarter at $25,000 per :30. For advertisers with 52-week commitments, the per-unit cost is $20,000. Long-term advertisers include Bristol-Myers, Warner-Lambert, Mars, Keebler and Ralston Purina. The show, which premiered in September, is described by Viacom as a celebrity sports competition in which the "sexiest and hottest stars go head-to-head for big bucks." Bruce Jenner and Pamela Sue Martin—to be replaced later this season by Morgan Brittany—are the host and hostess. Caroline Raskin is executive producer and Don Ohlmeyer is creative consultant. The show has been averaging an 8 rating and reaches 88% of U.S. tv households. The 52-week advertisers are guaranteed a 7 rating and a $4 cost-per-thousand.

"The Rock 'n' Roll Evening News" has now been barter-syndicated to 85 markets for a fall series start; 90% of those stations are network affiliates, led by WNBC-TV, New York; WMAQ, Chicago, and KCBS, Los Angeles. King World, New York, is handling station clearances for the weekly hour, with its Camelot Entertainment Sales division selling the commercial time.

Bruce Jenner (l.) and Morgan Brittany co-host "Star Games." Dick Butkus is commissioner of the athletic contests.

"Gidget" has now been cleared by 57 stations for 70% coverage of U.S. tv homes by Colex Enterprises, New York, the joint venture of Columbia Pictures TV, Burbank, and LBS Communications, New York. That count is up from 58% coverage after NATPE, with the latest stations including WOR-TV, New York; KTLA, Los Angeles, and WBGO, Chicago. Colex promises a minimum of 44 half hours or two years of weekly barter for the sitcom, through 1987-88. For fall '88, the carrier stations will strip this series with the original 32 offnet episodes starring Sally Field. Amount of commercial avails unavailable at press time.

"Open Season with George Steinbrenner," a half-hour, springtime series in which the Yankees owner will moderate a weekly debate on current sports issues, has been cleared by 85 stations so far, for 72% coverage of U.S. tv households. SFM Entertainment, New York, is selling 2½ minutes of national commercial time on the barter-syndicated series, to consist of 18 original episodes plus eight repeats. ■

TV POWER SHARES

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decidedly a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

A scheduling coup

Clever scheduling by NBC gave big preview numbers to new shows "Valerie" and "You Again?" "Valerie," a half-hour sitcom starring Valerie Harper, about to go weekly, appeared headed for a 16-share victory over "Airwolf" (CBS) and "Benson" (ABC) last Saturday, based on its overnight performance in 12 markets. "You Again?" picked up "Family Ties' " audience and more during its premiere episode: "Ties" has not yet achieved a 51 share, as "You Again?" did. The real test comes this month when both shows begin their "second season" run back-to-back at 8 p.m. (ET).

More good news for NBC: "The Cosby Show" scored its highest share ever (56) and the highest share for a sitcom since the Jan. 15, 1972, episode of CBS' "All in the Family" (58). "Miami Vice" crushed a softening "Falcon Crest." ■

Change in ad-tax plan won't ease opposition

By STEVEN W. COLFORD

WASHINGTON—New details of a Reagan administration proposal to reduce the tax deductibility of ad expenditures may soften the blow for advertisers but won't affect the ad industry's stiff opposition.

A Red Alert from the Assn. of National Advertisers and a Legislative Alert issued by the American Advertising Federation are intended to derail congressional tinkering with advertisers' deductions.

The American Assn. of Advertising Agencies made a special mailing to its 1,100 members and offices and hired Arthur Andersen & Co. to analyze the idea, calculate its financial impact and amass counterarguments.

Industry opposition was unflagging, even after more details of the proposal were disclosed late last week, revealing a formula for an 80% deduction in the year of the advertising expenditure, with the remaining 20% deducted in equal increments of 4% in each of the five succeeding years.

That option would produce less revenue for the federal government than the initially disclosed flat 20% disallowance, but also would substantially soften the bottom-line impact on advertisers.

A Senate finance committee aide said the latest deductibility option would "provide an initial, significant gain to the Treasury."

Government figures on how much revenue the option would generate—and cost advertisers—are expected this week from the finance committee. Aides emphasize that individual elements of the current tax-reform package might be revised or eliminated once the committee begins formal consideration of the bill, planned for March 19.

But Price Waterhouse advertising expert John Hatab said a calculation of the 80/20 plan with a five-year amortization schedule shows a net gain to the Treasury over five years of $21.6 billion, assuming annual advertising expenditure of $100 billion.

That $21.6 billion is identical to the savings originally projected by

Mennen plots a Real return to innovation

By PAT SLOAN

NEW YORK—Mennen Co. will make a grand return to the new-product scene this spring after an absence of five years, spending $14 million on media alone to introduce Real antiperspirant.

Mennen also is considering bringing out Baby Magic laundry detergent and Compete Skin Fitness for Men nationally by fall. If Baby Magic rolls national, it would pit Mennen against Procter & Gamble, marketer of Ivory Snow and Dreft.

Mennen has indicated to retailers that Real—with a water-free formula and patented applicators—could almost double the company's market share in the $1.2 billion deodorant/antiperspirant category. That category has grown 64% in dollar sales during the last five years.

The marketer has been seemingly gunshy of new-product introductions since it introduced Millionaire men's cologne in 1979 and Hawk men's fragrance in 1980, both of which performed poorly.

Observed Salomon Brothers vp Diana Temple, "Disappointments have a way of chastising companies. But, after some more recent success, Mennen's became a little more aggressive."

Mennen chairman Donald Horne described the company's new-products' drive as part of a more aggressive marketing program focusing on internal product development and acquisitions to help increase its current revenue base of about $162 million.

Last year, in its first foray outside health & beauty aids, Mennen acquired Indianapolis-based Paper Art, a marketer of decorative paper goods. Also during 1985, there were indications that Baby Magic Liquid would be introduced nationally (AA, Nov. 14). But instead, in November, it was merely put into a four-city test in Minneapolis, Fargo, N.D., Milwaukee and Grand Rapids, Mich.

Ms. Temple's reference to a recent success was based on Men-

Ratings change could cost cable net $7 million

MTV, Nielsen out of sync

By JUDANN DAGNOLI

NEW YORK—Depending on who you believe, MTV: Music Television's ratings either did or didn't take a disastrous tumble in the fourth quarter of 1985. As much as $7 million in potential make-goods from the cable network is riding on who's right—MTV or the Nielsen Television Index.

The dispute with Nielsen concerns a change in the number of households in the NTI sample that were capable of receiving MTV's programing.

MTV executives claim NTI is underreporting the cable network's ratings, because the fourth-quarter audience sample size included 25% fewer households that receive MTV than were covered in the third quarter last year. But Nielsen officials say its current household sample is more accurate than previous samples, which had overstated MTV viewing and inflated its ratings. In the third quarter of 1985, MTV averaged a 0.9 household rating. In the following quarter, sources said, household ratings dropped to 0.6.

Neither Nielsen nor MTV would reveal what the ratings were for MTV's key demographic category, men aged 18 to 24. MTV's refusal to release the ratings to advertisers, however, suggests the decline was as severe in that category as it was over-all.

A.C. Nielsen Co. officials declined to discuss the issue. However, in a letter to Robert Pittman, president-ceo of MTV parent MTV Networks, William Hamill, an exec vp at Nielsen, wrote, "Our findings to date have revealed that there have been major changes in the demographic composition of Nielsen's MTV installed and in-tab metered sample in the last six months. . .While fluctuations do occur in our MTV sample, we have not seen declines in any individual

Eastern's fare cuts vex Delta

Delta Air Lines is scrambling to protect itself from one of the swiftest, most aggressive promotion campaigns ever staged by rival Eastern.

Atlanta-based Delta, after expecting to feast on Eastern's much-publicized labor and financial crises and its pending takeover by Texas Air (AA, March 3), is instead weighing a crucial decision on whether to match Eastern's short-term, system-wide fare cuts and its elimination of most fare restrictions.

Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines is scrambling to protect itself from one of the swiftest, most aggressive promotion campaigns ever staged by rival Eastern.

The Appelman Affair 3
Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt hired William Appelman away from Young & Rubicam early this year, at the same time the two agencies were fighting for the $45 million Merrill Lynch account. The ethics of Mr. Appelman's involvment in Y&R's attempt to hold onto the account, which Bozell won, and the timing of his resignation, have some admen wondering.

Is the family way dying? 3
Most newspaper families are committed to maintaining control of their journalistic legacies. And most feel secure. But the value of newspaper companies, federal tax policy and simple human greed have put the newspaper family on the endangered species list.

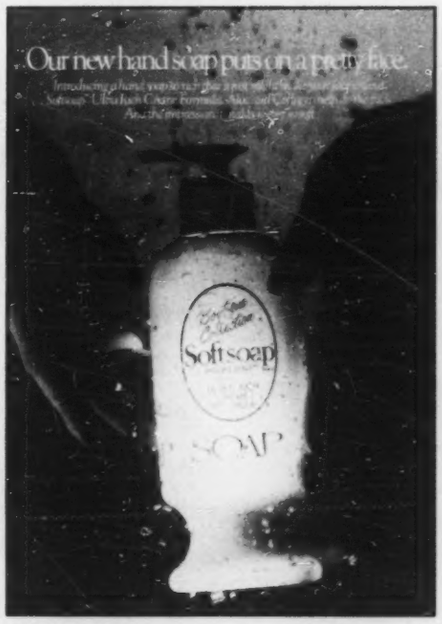
C-P to hold what it's got 12
The ascendancy of Robert Phillips to president-chief operating officer of Chesebrough-Pond's should short-circuit recent rumors that the Greenwich, Conn.-based company is looking to sell Stauffer Chemical Co.

Slim 'n Trim broadens reach 28
Slim 'n Trim is quadrupling its ad budget this year to $4 million and taking major steps toward becoming a national brand name. The formerly regional company has struck an agreement with Quality Chekd Dairies Assn. that will cover 36 states and four Canadian provinces.

Looking for stamp of approval 32
American Discount Stamps has yet to sign an advertiser or a distributor for an idea that has caught the national news media's fancy: Selling ad-supported and discounted 22¢ postage stamps.

Focus on corporate image 42
Corporate image advertising chases the spirit of a company, and that spirit-hunting has increased. One estimate places corporate image advertising spending at between $1.5 billion and $2 billion in 1984. That spending has been accelerated by name changes, divestitures and mergers, which require companies to publicize their identities.



More Minnetonka soft-peddling 49
Minnetonka may be the only marketer in the $100 million liquid-soap category that still believes it can squeeze out more sales, and it is readying additional line extensions in the category it created in 1980.

French tv faces crisis 56
When the votes from France's March 16 parliamentary elections are tallied, it could spell vast changes in the tv revolution started by President Francois Mitterrand. If his Socialist party loses its majority power, the future of several new private, ad-supported tv stations granted licenses by Mr. Mitterrand could be in trouble.

Bayer hands aspirins to McCann 58
Bayer AG, the German healthcare and chemical company, has picked McCann-Erickson to handle global advertising for the company's top-selling Bayer aspirin. The account, estimated at $10 million, will cover 10 countries both within and outside Europe, excluding the U.S.

Spain NATO role shaky 60
The Spanish government has mounted a massive, U.S.-style political advertising campaign to persuade voters that Spain should stay in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Taking the other side of the issue, which will be decided on in a referendum March 12, is a group of anti-U.S. pacifists, ecologists, communists and intellectuals.

FCB not yet prime takeover target

By GARY LEVIN

Shamrock Holdings' increased stake in Foote, Cone & Belding Communications doesn't yet make the agency a prime takeover target. But analysts now concede the possibility that a takeover bid could succeed under "ideal" conditions.

Shamrock, a Burbank, Cal.-based investment company controlled by Roy Disney, last week disclosed it holds 7.4% of FCB's common stock, up from the 5.2% it owned as of Feb. 3 (AA, Feb. 17). The move is part of a larger trend involving private-investor interest in both public and privately held agency stocks (see related story, Page 101).

K&B, Bates set date, spurn JWT

By PAUL L. EDWARDS

New York—Ted Bates and Kobs & Brady, Chicago, last week set their marriage for April 1 after a 3½-year courtship that nearly broke up at the last minute when J. Walter Thompson Co. came in with an unexpected offer for K&B.

Although terms were not disclosed, the purchase by Bates is considered to be the largest direct-marketing acquisition ever, worth between $10 million and $15 million.

K&B, the last of the large independent direct-marketing agencies, with $70.2 million in billings in 1985, this year received takeover bids from at least three ardent suitors. So hot

CCL wins Fidelity account

Fidelity Federal Savings & Loan Assn., Glendale, Cal., shifted its $2 million account to Cochrane Chase, Livingston & Co., Los Angeles, the agency formed last year with CCL's acquisition of Cunningham & Associates. CCL-Los Angeles manager Don Cunningham has previous ties to the s&l, which used his former agency, Cunningham, Root & Craig; from 1979 to 1985. Fidelity Federal was most recently with Kresser, Craig/D.I.K., Los Angeles, where

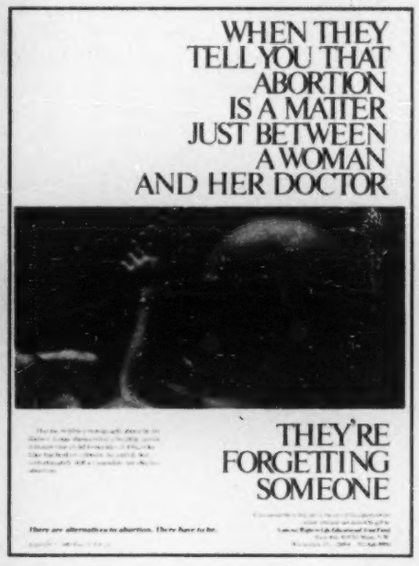
First, a caveat. We're New Yorkers, and our loyalties lie with the Giants and the Jets. However, we had to like these ads because they capitalized on the hoopla surrounding the Super Bowl and on the now ubiquitous Bears—before they won the game. The "Refrigerator" ad from Drexel Burnham Lambert, via Chiat/Day and featuring William Perry, was running before Super Sunday. The art's contrast with the headline provides the punch here; Mr. Perry is many things, but he isn't small. Creative director: Jay Chiat; art directors: Bob Dion, Marv Rich; copywriters: Bob Sundland, Amelia Rosner; photographer: Jean Moss. The Young & Rubicam, New York, Jim McMahon ad, sans Jim, ran the day after the Super Bowl. After Mr. McMahon's headband antics, there was no way to miss the point. Creative director: L. DiJoseph; art director: J. Polachek; copywriter: K. O'Donoghue; photographer: J. Endress.



This ad from the National Right to Life Committee in Washington uses an arresting headline and photograph that grab a reader's attention, regardless of one's position on the abortion issue. It also serves to present a powerful case to the unconvinced and also to act as a fund-raiser. The ad was created for the committee by Peter D. Erhard; the photo was taken by Dr. Rainer Jonas.

This ad for RC Cola, via Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, used newspaper space extremely well by running two pages back-to-back, so that the reader is prompted to look for the reason for the ad. It also represents a good marriage of image advertising and promotion, as it carried a coupon. Creative group head: Fred Massin; art director: Amy Bronstein; copywriter: Rex Wilder; illustrator: Elwyn Mehlman.

November slow for dailies

By WILLIAM F. GLOEDE

New York—Although major-market newspaper advertising for 16 categories rose an average 4.6% in November from year-ago, it was a mediocre month for most dailies. The increase in spending failed to keep pace with the average increase in ad rates, partly because the late Thanksgiving holiday in 1985 shaved a week off the Christmas selling season. Advertisers in the 16 major categories—12 of which posted increases—spent $351 million in November, about $15.5 million more than the $335.5 million spent in November, 1984, according to the FLASH REPORT of Newspaper Advertising Investments prepared for Ad Age by Media Records.

Department stores, the largest category measured, posted a 1.1% decline to $114.1 million. Among other retailers, general merchandise stores hiked spending 7.4% to $56.4 million; food stores spending rose 1.7% to $27.4 million; computer and supplies retailers raised spending 4.6% to $6.6 million, and radio-tv-phonograph-records dealers hiked spending 17.1% to $27.3 million.

Among other categories posting gains were amusements, up 11.9% to $29.2 million; alcoholic beverages, up 1.2% to $4.2 million; publishing and media, up 5.9% to $18.9 million; cigarets, up 15.1% to $9.2 million; airlines, up 10.3% to $14.3 million; passenger cars-new, up 22.2% to $18.5 million; banks and trust companies, up 38.9% to $7.9 million, and stock, bond and investment houses, up 14.2% to $2.3 million. The FLASH REPORT is based on MRI measurement of 29 daily and 23 Sunday newspapers in 15 major markets.#

Sergio in the fast lane

An Italian designer who blends sheet metal with poetics is a key element in Cadillac's hopes to refashion its image as North America's No. 1 luxury-car division. Sergio Pininfarina's name may not be widely known on this side of the Atlantic, but anyone who has watched Tom Selleck jump into a Ferrari Testarossa on "Magnum, P.I." is familiar with at least one of the cars for which he is responsible. He is chairman, president and chief executive officer of Italy's Industrie Pininfarina, S.p.A., charged with styling, developing and manufacturing bodies for the Cadillac Allante, an ultra-luxury, two-seat sports convertible with a price tag near $50,000. See Page 4.

If youngsters think ugly is in this year, the credit—or blame—should probably go to Topps Chewing Gum's Garbage Pail Kids. The Kids, a collection of grotesque trading card characters resembling Cabbage Patch Kids gone awry, caught on among grade-school children late last fall—demand has been so great that many storeowners have had to keep reordering the bubble gum cards. See Page 25.

Increasing fragmentation in buying motivations and styles among the affluent has retailers scrambling to target the category, which researchers find difficult to define and analyze. American Demographics places 4% of all U.S. households in the $75,000 annual household income category. Special Report looks at this group and how retailers in the U.S., the U.K., Japan and Canada are reaching the rich, starting on Page 11.

Jaguar unseats BJK&E

LEONIA, N.J.—Jaguar Cars is seeking a new agency for its $16 million-to-$20 million account after ending a 24-year relationship with Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, New York. Jaguar had been concerned that the merger of B&J and K&E would create a conflict with K&E client Chrysler Corp., but it held off until Chrysler's plans to import a $20,000-plus Maserati model became public. B&J handled Jaguar at the time of the merger.

Simpson to McCann post

NEW YORK—Clare Simpson has been named to the new post of director of Coca-Cola National Broadcast at McCann-Erickson. Mr. Simpson most recently was vp-programing at U.S. Satellite Broadcasting Co., a direct broadcast satellite company. He was at Young & Rubicam from 1959 to 1971 as senior vp-director of tv.

Merger cuts off accounts

BOSTON—Ingalls, Quinn & Johnson, formed by BBDO International's acquisition of Ingalls Associates and merger with Quinn & Johnson/BBDO, has resigned two of the three accounts that had loomed as conflicts (AA, March 6). One is Ingalls client Ground Round, West Quincy, Mass., which will delay its agency search for several months. The other loose account is Q&J's Sears Boston Group, which is talking to agencies interested in its "very small" local media placement account.

Losses at Mickelberry

NEW YORK—Mickelberry Corp. has reported a fourth-quarter net loss of $2.6 million, versus its $518,000 loss in the year-ago quarter, following a $3.3 million write-off related to intangible assets in subsidiary operations that were restructured during the year. Revenues fell 8.7% to $31.6 million. For the year, there was a net loss of $1.8 million, versus net income of $1.3 million in '84, as revenues were up 6% to $131.6 million.

What do you think of the new advertising campaign created by Leo Burnett USA for 7UP?

Peter Burkhard, senior vp-creative director, Needham Harper Worldwide, Washington: "Weather prediction: 7UP's downpour will play better in summer than winter. Sales to follow the thermometer [c.f. Fresca 'blizzard']. Expect Carson and 'SNL' spoofs. Pray the customers don't catch cold."

P. BURKHARD

Steve Laughlin, partner-creative director, Frankenberry, Laughlin & Constable, Milwaukee: "I think they're in a tough category because both Pepsi and Coke are doing better ads. They have a difficult task trying to outshine Coke and Pepsi. The [7UP] theme line I don't really care for. But I think the execution is fantastic. It's very consistent. The production values are superb. If I were an agency producer walking into a presentation with those tapes under my arm, I'd feel pretty good."

Joan McArthur, acting creative director, Doyle Dane Bernbach, San Francisco: "They're so smart. Once again, they've taken what makes them different from colas and turned it into a virtue. So instead of just tossing us a few laughs, this advertising might even make you want to drink the stuff."

J. MCARTHUR

M. NOVETT

Marleen Novett, creative supervisor, N W Ayer, New York: "From what I've seen, I think its delightful. It's nice and fresh. I thought to myself when I saw it, 'I hope you don't have to wait for rain to drink 7UP', but I still think it's funny and charming."

John Wagner, president-ceo, Wagner & Associates Advertising, Chicago: "I think it's pretty good advertising. The rain is a very refreshing, cooling mnemonic device. 'Feels so good coming down.' That's a nice line. I think they have a very good feeling. It's reminiscent of a campaign I did while at Burnett in the early '70s. It's a little bit like 'Take the Nestea plunge' revisited 15 years later."

Affluent Marketing

Fragmentation enriches problems in reaching group

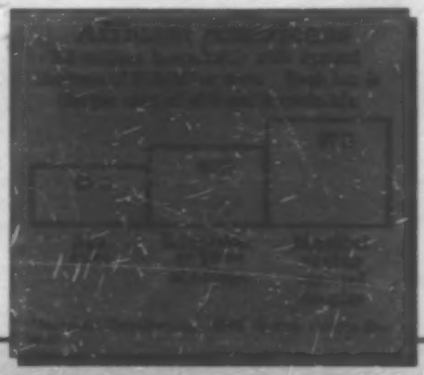
By Joanne Cleaver

They don't think of themselves as rich, but they spend like the rich. "The old rich have their net worth in jewels, furniture, houses. The new rich say, 'I have earned it and I'm going to spend it,'" says Judith Price, publisher of Avenue, the heavy, glossy magazine hand delivered to residents of New York's tony Upper East Side.

Many others who watch the affluent market agree with Ms. Price's assessment. The segment is growing, but it's still small. American Demographics places 4% of all households—3.3 million—in the $75,000 or more category.

But more important than the market's size is the category's attractiveness to nearly everyone—marketers, retailers and consumers.

The amount of money earned by these households says very little about the amount they have to spend, how they can be persuaded to spend it, and how it's finally spent.



Consultants, retailers and researchers say they perceive an increasing fragmentation of buying motivations and styles among the affluent. While conspicuous consumption is popular, many consumers will buy only certain items to impress others or themselves. Some affluent consumers value service and time savings over money; others are determined to stretch their dollars as far as possible.

The only thing that marketers can take for granted is that because they're more aware of their purchasing power, the affluent are determined to get their money's worth. With "everybody and his grandmother," in the words of one researcher, pursuing this market, the ones who will succeed are those who correctly analyze the needs and wants of the affluent consumers and are able to provide the right price-value balance.

The actual number of affluent people and

Creativity in print atuned to affluent taste

The rich are different. Something about them makes the advertising industry reach for particularly creative ways to appeal to the discriminating tastes of the affluent market.

Attracting this market is as complex as defining its demographics or its spending patterns and is accomplished primarily through print advertising.

To further expand the presentation of marketing to the affluent, Special Report scanned several of the most recent upscale publications for what we consider to be outstanding creative work being done for marketers targeting this small but growing sector.

The following portfolio of ads illustrates how when you want to get the best, you have to try and give the best.

Fragmentation enriches

households is a matter of debate. According to a report by Grey Advertising, New York, it takes about $75,000 today to equal the spending power of $40,000 in 1975. The Grey researchers estimate that in 1983 about 2.4 million households had annual incomes of $75,000 or more—only 200,000 more than there were in the equivalent category in 1975.

However, other researchers detect greater growth. Because many upper-income households include two wage earners, they have been undercounted by traditional door-to-door survey takers. Consequently, many researchers are switching to mail surveys to obtain more accurate results.

In its 1985-86 report on affluence, Mendelsohn Media Research, New York, categorizes annual household income of $50,000 or more as affluent, totaling 28.5 million, or 17% of all adults and 13% of all households, and claiming 36% of all income. That category exploded in this decade, nearly doubling between 1979 and 1985. Between 1984 and 1985 alone, it grew 22.7%. Most of those households, however, don't make the $60,000 or more income cut, leaving only 13.6 million adults in the upper deck.

The demographic profile of upper-income households reveals 65.7% of adults earning $60,000 and more had at least some college and live in a household made up of 2.7 adults or 3.2 people, according to Mendelsohn data.

But statistics don't tell the whole story.

Thomas Stanley, professor of marketing at Georgia State University, Atlanta, says affluent income and net worth often are quite different, especially for those in the "lower" end (those with $75,000 to $100,000 annual income) of the market—almost half of those households earning $75,000-plus earn less than $100,000. "The typical millionaire in America realizes less than 10% of his income in a year," he says.

(Estimates of the number of millionaires—in terms of net worth—in America range from 500,000 to 1 million. Much of that worth probably is tied up in real estate. In 1982, the last year for which such figures were released, the Internal Revenue Service reported that only 8,408 taxpayers reported $1 million in adjusted gross income.)

The newly affluent are eager to prove their status with symbols of "having arrived," be it a Mercedes-Benz, an Italian leather couch or a pantry stuffed with exotic imported foods, Mr. Stanley says.

Mendelsohn research seems to support these perceptions of a materialistic outlook. In many categories—those that require really big expenditures such as real estate, securities, air travel, cruises, art, antiques and jewelry—people in the $60,000 and more income category spend far more than those who make up to $10,000 less. But spending was nearly equal for all the survey respondents making $50,000 and more for certain status items—videocassette recorders, photographic and sports equipment, personal computers, and cosmetics and fragrances.

Not all affluent consumers share that attitude. "Spending patterns are much more varied than people realize. There is a segment into conspicuous consumption and another that's quite the opposite. Whatever the latest status symbol is, they'll want the opposite," says Judith Langer of Langer Associates, New York, a qualitative research company.

Ms. Langer and other researchers emphasize that life stage affects an affluent household's disposable income. A $100,000 annual income family with three children in college at the same time has far less discretionary income than a young professional couple with no house and no children making the same.

"They [most households with $100,000 incomes] are affluent, not rich. They're making choices; they spend freely in one area and not in others. They may have to choose between clothes and a vacation," Ms. Langer says.

Thomas Murnane, group vp for Management Horizons, the Columbus, O., division of Price Waterhouse that specializes in consulting to retailers, says the affluent are at least as value-conscious as other consumers. "They shop in a variety of retail outlets. They'll shop the lower-end stores for low ego involvement purchases—a branded set of casserole dishes, for example. Yet when it comes to a high-involvement purchase, where there's a lot of financial or social risk, they'll go to a high-end store."

Faced with the increasing fragmentation of their most desirable market, retailers are experimenting with the price-value balance, trying to determine what added services and merchandising philosophies are attractive to the well-heeled.

A key element of that formula is a renewed emphasis on service. Specialty and department stores are both recognizing the need for informed sales personnel and regular personalized customer contact, be it via direct mail or through a salesperson's list of customer preferences.

"Service is more important today than the merchandise," says Larry Gore, president of Brittany Enterprises, a year-old Chicago holding company for several men's and women's upper-end clothing stores. "The key thing is to develop a relationship. Assess the customer, and be sure you sell the customer what's appropriate. Don't oversell them."

Appropriately, many big city department stores are reviving or creating small services that cultivate customer loyalty. Free downtown delivery services, free alterations, personal shopping services and higher paid (and presumably more attentive) sales staffs are some.

Bloomingdale's recently announced an expanded registry service: Children can register for their birthdays, young people for graduation, parents for their newborns, and singles for the fun of it, says Gordon Cooke, exec vp-sales promotion.

Of course, even the widest array of retail services is worthless unless consumers know about them. Reaching the affluent is as complex as defining the market.

Tv, except for public tv, generally is considered an inefficient way to reach the affluent. Direct mail, especially catalogs, is used by traditional retailers as well as mail order houses.

A plethora of new magazines aimed at the upper end have been appearing in the past couple of years, many controlling their circulations. For example, Best, an advertiser-supported expansion of the newsletter-like "Best Report," will be introduced in May as a monthly newspaper insert delivered to 250,000 homes in selected suburban New York Zip codes. Participating newspapers include: the Long Island, N.Y., Newsday; Stamford/Greenwich, Conn., Advocate/Times; Westchester County, N.Y., Gannett papers; Bergen, N.J., Record, and New Brunswick, N.J., Home News.

The philosophy behind Best publications, founder and publisher Norman Aronson says, is to provide readers with a compendium of top-quality goods from around the world. While purchasing information is included, it is not a catalog.

Mr. Aronson persuaded various pharmaceutical companies to sponsor many of the issues of the newsletter, which were sent to 150,000 physicians, compliments of the sponsors. Twenty thousand subscribers—an unaudited figure—pay $48 annually for the newsletter.

Even publications that already are well established with affluent readers are changing their image. Metropolitan Home recently discovered the median household income of its readers is $81,900. To make the magazine a "more luxury product," publisher Steve Burzon says, it is undergoing a $5 million face lift. While the editorial focus won't change, starting with the September issue, the magazine will use heavier stock and higher quality inks and be 17% bigger, measuring 9-by-10¼-ins.

According to Thomas Black, associate publisher for Smithsonian, in the next few years the affluent market's desire for quality will be a primary factor in shaping both the media's presentation of themselves and marketers' messages through the media.

Mr. Black and others involved in analyzing the affluent segment say marketers must be especially sensitive to the self-consciousness of the affluent. Reaching them requires a careful blend of image and price, in both the ads and the products. "This is a market of the mind, with quality the ultimate goal," says Mr. Black.

the three-hour adult contemporary countdown show will ring in spring with an "April Fools" special, featuring songs that bespeak the foolishness that often accompanies amorousness. The following weekend, April 11 to 13, the foolishness of love yields to the desire for dampness as the theme shifts to "April Showers," featuring songs of rain and the absence thereof. The show clears more than 300 stations nationwide. Spots are available for both of these shows.

Creative Broadcast Programs radio network this month begins airing the internationally syndicated "Rock Over London" series on 40 Canadian radio stations, including affiliates in the country's top 12 markets. The Canadian premiere, slated for March 24, features an interview with the Electric Light Orchestra and the debut of a new song from Howard Jones. Next month, a French-language version of the show will bow in Quebec. Spots are available.

Westwood One has teamed up with CBS/Sony Songs in Japan to form Westwood One/Japan, which will offer Westwood One fare to radio stations in Japan. One of the new venture's first efforts will be the production of an hourlong, magazine-style program that will feature both concerts and interviews. No start date has been announced.

NBC Entertainment Network's Live Album Party features Julian Lennon March 20. Participating advertisers include Schoenling's Little Kings beer. ■

TV AVAILS

A weekly listing of tv programming that still has commercial availabilities open in the next few weeks.

"The New Gidget," a first-run series from Colex, New York, is packaging units for upfront barter advertisers for about $50,000 per 30-second unit and a $5 cost-per-thousand. Colex is projecting an 8.0 to 8.5 national rating for the show, which will have double runs mostly in weekend access. Colex, the joint venture between Columbia TV and LBS Communications, will produce 22 half-hour episodes for 1986-87 and 22 for 1987-88. After the show's initial two-year barter run, it will revert to a cash-only basis. "Gidget" has been cleared in 70% of the U.S. and expects to clear more than 85% by its September airdate. "The New Gidget" is a temporary name for the show to distinguish it from the original offnetwork "Gidget," which Colex also syndicates.

Also bartered by Colex, "Hollywood Squares" (an Orion TV production) will be sold for an average $40,000 per 30-second unit. Colex is projecting a 9 rating for its September start date. Several top ABC-TV stations have picked up the show, including

A fire-breathing Godzilla evacuates the city in "Godzilla 1985."

WLS in Chicago, WABC in New York and KGO in San Francisco. Colex's "National Geographic Specials" will be priced at $50,000 per :30. Genesis Entertainment is the distributor. Colex is guaranteeing a 10 household rating. Some of the specials that originally aired on PBS got 13 ratings. The hourlong specials will be run as two-hour blocks. Colex is scheduling 12 plays a year.

"Godzilla 1985," produced by New World Pictures and distributed by All American Television, New York, has 28 avails in its May 16 telecast at $40,000 per 30-second unit. The two-hour movie has been cleared in 85% of the U.S. Except for WTTG, Washington, the Fox TV stations will carry the movie from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m. (ET). All American is guaranteeing an 8.5 household rating and expects a heavy teen and young-adult skew for the movie. All American plans to barter individual, monthly first-run movies starting in September.

Children's tv update: LBS Communications and Lorimar-Telepictures dominated most of the sales action in the recent upfront children's barter tv market. LBS' top shows included "Care Bears" and "Heathcliff." L-T's big draw was "Thundercats," the top-rated barter show for kids aged 2 to 11. The new "Silverhawks" also sold well. Both syndicators have each sold between $25 million and $30 million in inventory. Group W ("He-Man" and "She-Ra") reaped more than $20 million in sales. Tribune Entertainment handled media sales for the Group W production "Ghostbusters." Worldvision ("Rambo" and "Centurions") and TPE ("Challenge of the Gobots" and "Smurfs") also were major players. National ad rates were not immediately available. ■

TV POWER SHARES

The following chart lists network tv shows that won their time periods, ranked by audience share dominance. It is a reflection of how decidedly a particular show defeated its immediate competition and reflects the program's dominance of available audience. The numbers following the program name are the amount of share points by which the program defeated the second-place show during each week shown. An indicator of 10 or more is considered "dominant," while 5 to 10 is considered "good." Anything less than 5 is a "borderline" victory. Source: Nielsen Overnight Ratings.

BEHIND THE SHARES

New NBC series win

All things being equal, NBC did a much better job of introducing its second season series, "Valerie" and "You Again?" than CBS did with "Fast Times" and "Tough Cookies." The numbers prove it. NBC used two potent time periods, usually occupied by "Facts of Life" and "Family Ties," to display its new entries. Audiences approved, and followed them to their new spots on Monday. But CBS threw its new shows into the soup without adding any spice. No big premieres. No hoopla. The initial numbers were disappointing. The fact is, CBS had no strong youth-oriented barnburner—like "Family Ties"—to preempt.

But what CBS lacks in youth is more than compensated for by older adult hits. Numbers for "60 Minutes" and "Dallas" were among their best outings this season. And CBS just keeps racking up those wins with its Sunday night movies (and miniseries).

Even ABC has much to be happy about, despite its also-ran status. Its top shows continue to trend up, even when burdened by repeats. "Moonlighting" may do to the ABC schedule in 1986-87 what "Miami Vice" did for NBC's this season: Bring it a certifiable trendy megahit. As a repeat, the show had an 8-share romp this past week after a one-week hiatus. "The Colbys" is also proving a late bloomer for ABC. It's now hitting 25-share levels with regularity and will almost certainly approach 30 next season, as "Cheers" starts to slip.

NBC displayed more of the same programing acumen by sliding "Alfred Hitchcock" into the berth regularly occupied by "227." By picking up "227's" audience, NBC hopes to pad Hitchcock's performance on Sunday, March 16, when it will run 10 p.m. to 11 p.m. (ET).

"Remington Steele" also has been rejuvenated in its new Saturday slot. Only time will tell whether the show is dying as it appeared to be doing on Tuesday or simply needed to find a new audience on a new night. ■

U.S. scraps $20 billion ad-tax threat

By STEVEN W. COLFORD

WASHINGTON—The Reagan administration last week scrapped a plan that would have squeezed billions in tax dollars from corporate advertising expenditures.

The tax proposal, which would have ended advertising's status as a fully deductible business expense, was put to rest at a private briefing for ad industry leaders by the Treasury Department. Roger Mentz, deputy assistant treasury secretary for tax policy, acknowledged that reshaping the tax code to the detriment of large and small advertisers imposed more adverse effects than the administration was prepared to bear.

Until then, the proposal was considered part of the tax-reform package being shaped by Senate finance committee chairman Robert Packwood (R., Ore.).

Though no longer part of the Packwood plan, ad industry officials said they would maintain their anti-tax vigil. "We won't quit until the stake is in Dracula's heart and we know it won't come back to life," said Dan Jaffe, senior vp, Assn. of National Advertisers.

First put forward as a revenue-raising option by the Treasury Department (AA, Feb. 17, et seq.), the proposal would have reduced the deductibility of advertising expenses from 100% to 80%. A subsequent version, opposed by the ad industry with equal vigor, would have allowed an 80% deduction in the year the advertising expenditure was made, and allow the remaining 20% to be deducted in 4% increments in each of the next five years (AA, March 10).

Both plans would have raised approximately $21.6 billion over five years, according to Treasury and outside estimates.

Industry officials said Mr. Mentz contended the deductibility option was the brainchild of the Senate finance committee staff and was rejected by the administration as bad fiscal policy.

"Everything he said about the proposal was negative," said Mr. Jaffe. "It was like what he was saying had been scripted by us—its impact on the economy, its arbitrariness and all. We couldn't have said it any better."

Others at the briefing were ANA president DeWitt Helm; Howard Bell, president of the American Advertising Federation; Wally Snyder, AAF senior vp; Bill Gorog, president, Magazine Publishers Assn., and Bernie Ryan, vp, American Assn. of Advertising Agencies.

Opposition to the proposal was mounted by business as well as by the ad industry, which launched what Mr. Helm called an unprecedented lobbying effort against it.

New high-yield Folgers battles coffee price rise

By PATRICIA WINTERS

Procter & Gamble, responding to skyrocketing wholesale coffee prices due to a six-month drought in Brazil, is rolling national with an 11.5-oz. Folgers brand that yields the same amount of brewed coffee as a 1-lb. can, but costs about $1 less.

Folgers Special Roast Flaked coffee uses an improved fast-roasting technology and fewer raw coffee beans to produce what Cincinnati-based P&G believes is the same taste as regular coffee. A three-month national print and tv campaign for the product, via Cunningham & Walsh, New York, breaks March 25.

High-yield coffee is not new. Following the Brazilian freeze in the mid-'70s, when retail prices peaked at $3.47 per pound, most coffee marketers came out with high-yield brands in 13-oz. cans. General Foods initiated the segment with its Maxwell House Master's Blend, which was then followed closely by Folgers' Flaked. But Folgers' new entry is the first 11.5-oz. high-yield variety that produces the same liquid as a pound.

The 11.5-oz. product, which was tested in Oklahoma and Texas, carries a suggested retail price of $2.77 a can. The average national price of a 1-lb. can of coffee in late February was $3.15, with some leading brands topping $3.75. New Special Roast Flaked will also be sold in 23-oz. cans, yielding a 2-lb. equivalent, and 33-oz. cans, yielding a 3-lb. equivalent.

With the Brazilian drought forcing up coffee prices, and predictions that prices could average $4.50 a pound by yearend, Folgers new high-yield brand gives P&G

Soft market nags daytime tv sales

By VERNE GAY

NEW YORK—The most profitable daypart in network tv is now one of the most troubled.

Network executives at ABC-TV and CBS-TV have been puzzled by a prolonged sales drought in daytime tv. Prices have weakened so dramatically that some buyers entering the market on a weekly basis have cut deals 30% to 40% cheaper than upfront inventory costs.

ABC reportedly has more unsold inventory than CBS, while NBC has very little. The lowest-rated network in daytime, NBC has been artificially tight in first-quarter daytime because of make-goods to advertisers.

The problem is so pronounced that this year's daytime upfront market could be adversely affected. The networks sold more than $880 million in daytime upfront for 1985-86, a 10% decline from the year before. They had held the line on upfront prices in anticipation of another strong scatter market in 1986. But as one agency executive said, "It was a false marketplace last year."

Despite daytime's woes, other network dayparts, especially late night, were believed to be more firm. Sports, however, is still soft.

CBS Inc. chairman Thomas Wyman last week surprised analysts by predicting his company would post first-quarter net profit of between 25¢ and 50¢ a share, in part due to recent strength in ad sales. That performance would not equal the 56¢ a share profit CBS reported in the 1985 first quarter. Analysts, however, had predicted a

London papers go color 74
Newspapers in London have suddenly taken on a new, more colorful look since the introduction earlier this month of Eddy Shah's new tabloid, Today. The new paper uses 16 pages of color ads and photographs daily, and Mr. Shah's competitors are struggling to match his efforts. So far, the results have been lackluster, but not for lack of trying.

Burnett arms for assault abroad 74
Chicago-based Leo Burnett Co.'s international division faced a tough 1985 after Nestle moved $40 million in overseas billings from the agency. The result, partially due to poor exchange rates, was that Burnett's gross income overseas dropped 0.7% to $90 million while overseas billings fell 0.5% to $599 million. Most of the other top 10 agencies with offices overseas saw their billings jump at least 10% last year.

WCI buy makes Electrolux world leader

By PAT McGEEHAN

The impending acquisition of White Consolidated Industries by Swedish appliance giant AB Electrolux will make Electrolux the largest appliance marketer in the world and give it a No. 3 position in U.S. market share.

But the takeover is not expected to have a disruptive impact on the domestic appliance market.

Months before executives of Cleveland-based WCI were unpleasantly surprised by Electrolux's initial offer of $711 million or $43 a share, they had begun revamping the company's marketing operations and upgrading its facilities to make it more competitive with U.S. market leaders General Electric and Whirlpool Corp.

This newfound aggressiveness was one of the things that attracted Electrolux to WCI in the first place. Electrolux itself has a reputation for being aggressive, having gobbled up dozens of companies around the globe in the last 20 years, while keeping a close eye on the bottom line. When the Stockholm-based company upped the ante to $743 million, or $47 a share, WCI's new ceo Ward Smith acquiesced.

"I'd say it's very likely they will gain share through the synergy of adding strong brand names, but not necessarily at the expense of GE and Whirlpool," said James Magid, an analyst with L.F. Rothschild Unterberg Towbin, New York.

Electrolux had 1985 sales of $5.5 billion, about $1 billion of which came from the U.S., the company's largest market. (Electrolux is not affiliated with Electrolux Corp., a Stamford, Conn.-based division of Sara Lee Corp. that markets Electrolux vacuum cleaners and floor polishers.)

WCI's 1985 sales totaled about $1.95 billion, 85% of which came from appliances. WCI supplies home appliances to national retailers Sears, Roebuck & Co. and Montgomery Ward & Co., as well as marketing four brands of its own: White-Westinghouse, Frigidaire, Gibson and Kelvinator.

The combination of WCI's brands and Electrolux's U.S. subsidiaries—Tappan Co. and Eureka Co.—solidifies the company's No. 3 position in the U.S., where it holds an estimated 15% share of the total appliance market.

Industry observers see the deal as good for both parties. Electrolux will get a full line of U.S.-made "white goods," which it believes will strengthen its already-dominant position in Europe. Electrolux is concerned that its European market share is vulnerable to expansion-minded U.S. appliance companies and may market selected WCI brands overseas.

WCI gains a solid foothold in the booming microwave oven segment. Mansfield, O.-based Tappan Co. owns 8% of the microwave market and 17% of the growing gas range segment. The merged entity would rank second in both electric and gas ranges, with 22% and 24%, respectively.

The deal is expected to have little effect on WCI's ongoing program to consolidate marketing for its four brands under one roof in Columbus, O., or its current five-year, $500 million upgrading of facilities. The aggressiveness the company has shown in recent months under Mr. Smith, who succeeded Roy Holdt after several years as president, is seen as a key factor in attracting Electrolux.

Electrolux has established a policy of allowing its subsidiaries to operate in relative autonomy, pursuing their own marketing and advertising strategies, after the new parent has done some initial streamlining. The company is expected to extend the same freedom to WCI after selling off its non-appliance businesses, particularly its machine tools division.

"Our basic philosophy is to leave each company to make its own advertising and marketing decisions," said an Electrolux spokesman, who added that Tappan is allowed "complete freedom" to make advertising and marketing plans.

"We try to broadly coordinate marketing among the group of companies, but it isn't any ring of steel in terms of dictating policy," the spokesman said. "Companies are very free in making their own decisions."

Any changes in WCI's advertising assignments in the near future will more likely be a result of the marketing consolidation than the merger. The company has been criticized over the years for its uncoordinated marketing operations.

Frigidaire, the only WCI brand name that carries any real weight with consumers, is the only brand handled by a major ad agency: Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago. Gibson Appliance Co., Greenville, Mich., has been handled by William R. Biggs/Gilmore Associates, a small agency in Grand Rapids, Mich. Advertising for the other brands has been handled in-house.

Placing more emphasis on its strongest asset, the Frigidaire name, may already be in the cards, said one industry analyst. "White under Roy Holdt was more interested in diversification than intensification," said Mr. Magid. "They didn't pursue the advantage of one of the best quality brand names in the appliance industry."

Mr. Magid described Frigidaire's long-running ad campaign that has stressed the durability of its products as "the second-best appliance campaign ever," second only to the "Ol' Lonely" Maytag Co. ads created by Leo Burnett USA. "I think [Frigidaire's is] one of the most imitated ad campaigns in America. It promotes the durability of one product versus the durability of others, and it has shamelessly been ripped off by dozens of companies."

The promotion of Richard Zoellner, former president of Frigidaire Co., to head WCI's marketing operations signals Mr. Smith's recognition that the Frigidaire unit was the company's strongest link with consumers, Mr. Magid said. "Electrolux comes in at a time when White is moving in the right direction. They've got many of the right people in the right jobs and a favorable framework to combine the companies.

"It's as though the Kentucky Derby is fixed and you're the jockey who drew the right horse—you're going to be famous."

Jack Burton in Stockholm contributed to this story.

The strength of Electrolux and Tappan combined

AB Electrolux's acquisition of White Consolidated Industries would create a strong competitor in ranges, both gas and electric. The combination of brands would rank second with 24% of the growing gas range segment and 22% of electrics. These figures are based on 1984 production totals. Source: Appliance Magazine.

SGMA expands study

North Palm Beach, Fla.—Sporting Goods Manufacturers Assn. has begun an expanded quarterly study of sporting goods sales, covering 150 products, more than triple the 45 covered last year.

Data will be compiled by NPD Research, Port Washington, N.Y., from a mail panel of 50,000 consumer households per quarter, for a total of 200,000 for all of 1986.

Subscribers may opt for full product coverage or specify either sports equipment or sports apparel/footwear sales reports, SGMA said.

An introductory subscription program has yet to be set.

Information is available from SGMA at 200 Castlewood Dr., 33408.

Ad Age picks jingle finalists

NEW YORK—ADVERTISING AGE's editors have narrowed their list of contenders for the annual Best Commercial Music of the Year Award to six pieces of music in the "original" category and another six in the "adaptation" category.

The winners in each category will be announced and presented their awards at ADVERTISING AGE's gala awards banquet April 22, at Chicago's Hyatt Regency Hotel.

At that dinner, other AA awards also will be presented, including Agency of the Year, Star Presenter, Best Director and 16 categories of Best Television Commercials.

The finalists in the "original" jingle category (music created specifically for commercials), in alphabetical order by advertiser, are: American Dairy Assn.'s "Get on a Health Kick. . .Milk's Got More"; Kimberly-Clark Corp.'s "Kleenex Says, 'Bless You' "; Montgomery Ward & Co.'s "Things Are Changing at Montgomery Ward"; Nestle Co.'s "Please Don't Eat All the Morsels" for its Nestle tollhouse cookie chocolate morsels; Plymouth division of Chrysler Corp., for "The Pride is Back, Born in America Again," and Stroh Brewery's "Now You're Talking Good Times, and Stroh's is Spoken Here."

AA staffers in all its bureaus also chose the nominees for music adapted from popular songs for use in commercial jingles.

Those contenders, again alphabetically by client, are:

American Greetings' "Why Do Fools Fall in Love?" (based on Frankie Lymon & the Teenagers' '50s hit); Chevrolet trucks' "Lean on Me" (based on Bill Withers' hit); E. & J. Gallo Winery for its Gallo synthesizer theme (adapted from "Hymne," from the "Operasauvage" album by Vangelis of "Chariots of Fire" fame); Procter & Gamble's "Jump" for its Bounce fabric softener (based on the Pointer Sisters' hit "Jump [for My Love]"); Volkswagen GTI's "No Particular Place to Go" (adapted from Chuck Berry's recording), and Wendy's International's "Only Wendy's" (adapted from the Platters' hit "Only You").

More than 20 jingles under each of those two broad headings had been considered.

The price of tickets to the AA banquet (black-tie optional), which are tax-deductible, is $150 per person or $1,500 for a table seating 10 people.

Proceeds of the dinner will go to the Museum of Broadcast Communications in Chicago, a not-for-profit organization designed to preserve, examine, explain and celebrate the history of broadcast advertising. A.C. Nielsen Jr. is chairman of the museum's board. David Ofner, director of corporate development, Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, is general chairman of the awards dinner.

Seats can be reserved by filling out the adjoining coupon and mailing it to the museum at 233 N. Michigan Ave., Suite 1800, Chicago 60601.#

Popeyes boosts ad budget by 25%

By SHARON DONOVAN

NEW ORLEANS—Popeyes Famous Fried Chicken and Biscuits, fresh from its split with New York-based Doyle Dane Bernbach, is hiking 1986 advertising expenditures 25% to almost $13 million while striking different approaches for new and mature markets.

The chain, which has nearly 600 units, broke a new straightforward campaign this month in 15 of Popeyes' "mature" markets nationwide and in 15 new markets. The look is different but the message is the same—"Love that chicken from Popeyes."

The ads are the first created and produced by Popeyes' in-house following the dismissal of DDB (AA, Feb. 10). Vitt Media, New York, continues to handle media buys.

Popeyes also announced the creation of five regions, with regional marketing managers responsible for helping franchisees customize their marketing strategies.

"No longer will we force the national marketing program, but now we will build each market from the ground up," said Chuck Coffman, advertising manager.

If a market is new, Mr. Coffman said, advertising will focus on chicken. If mature, the advertising will highlight Popeyes' side dishes—red beans and rice, onion rings and biscuits. A spot emphasizing biscuits, for example, shows a biscuit-cutter piercing the dough, pans of piping-hot biscuits emerging from the oven and finally a buttery brush grazing the top of a biscuit.

Spots for new markets show chicken steaming in open boxes interspersed with short closeups of customers' testimonials. The spots are tagged "There's just one place for that famous taste."

A total of seven basic tv spots, in 60 and 30-second versions, can be edited into 20 versions for different marketing strategies.

In radio, Popeyes has seven different 60 and 30-second jingles. The "Love that chicken" message is backed by various forms of music, including a slow rag, a crossover black version and a boogie tempo. For the first time, Popeyes is producing a Hispanic radio spot for use throughout the Southwest.

Lamar Berry, Popeyes vp-advertising and marketing, expects the new campaign to push the chain's sales to $400 million this year, compared with $348 million in 1985.

With a sales boost, No. 3 Popeyes hopes to gain on No. 1 Kentucky Fried Chicken, Louisville, which has about 4,000 units worldwide, and No. 2 Church's Fried Chicken, San Antonio, which has about 1,000 units.

Over-all, fast-food restaurants have outpaced consumer demand in unit expansion, said Mr. Berry. The segment's unit growth increased by 6% in 1985, compared with only a 2% growth in consumer traffic and a 2% decrease in consumers' disposable income, he said.

Popeyes' previous "hair-raising" tv spots, via DDB, were effective to a point, Mr. Berry said. In the spots, consumers' hair would stand up in response to the spicy taste of Popeyes' chicken.

"In the hair-raising campaign, we set out to show the spicy difference, and that was accomplished," Mr. Berry said. "But now our image has to go beyond that."#

Fast-food chains' tv spending

Restaurant and fast-food marketers last year spent nearly $1.1 billion on network and spot tv, the first time the category has moved past the $1 billion mark. The restaurant category joins food/food products, automotive and toiletries in the billion-dollar club. Network tv expenditures rose 10.3% for the year; spot tv spending was up 10.3%. Source: Television Bureau of Advertising from Broadcast Advertisers Reports data.

Agency results show effect of ad slowdown

By STEWART ALTER

Last year was a disappointment in total ad spending and in the financial results of most of the public advertising agencies.

And some agencies had particular trouble spots to deal with. Most notably, Mickelberry Corp. took a $3.3 million writeoff of intangible assets in U.S. subsidiary operations that were restructured during the year. Others had problems overseas, with BBDO International and JWT Group taking writeoffs on discontinued operations, while Foote, Cone & Belding Communications struggled with absorbing its NCK and Siboney foreign acquisitions.

"Essentially, total spending was below where anybody thought it would be at the beginning of the year," said James Dougherty, an analyst at Eberstadt Fleming Inc., New York, who noted that McCann-Erickson director of forecasting Robert Coen had revised his estimates downward twice in 1985. Mr. Coen, who had started the year predicting a 9.7% increase in ad spending, ended the year with an 8.3% estimate.

Basically, the fast-growth ad categories dried up. Mr. Dougherty noted that some "typical" fast-growth advertisers were down in spending compared with 1984.

"Spending for computers, office equipment and supplies and air-freight forwarding actually declined during the first half of 1985, and only spending on entertainment recorded an increase that was at all consistent with spending growth between 1979 and 1984," said Mr. Dougherty.

In the first six months of 1985, for example, Mr. Dougherty noted that AT&T was down 13.3%, IBM Corp. was down 3%, American Express was down 19.1%, Citicorp was up 7.9%, Warner Communications was up 1.8% and Apple Computer was up 9.5%. These are the kinds of companies that had shown major increases in ad spending in the period between 1979 and 1984.

"The slower growth rate in 1985 is a result of a number of factors," said Emma Hill of Wertheim & Co., New York. "First, spending growth tends to moderate coming off an Olympics/election year," she said, noting also that the "important categories" of business and consumer services and retail were flat, and that office equipment "declined slightly, after growing at a rate close to 50% over the last few years." Cigarets and apparel also showed cutbacks, she said.

Agency financial results

Except for the Ogilvy Group and the Interpublic Group of Cos., which turned in respectable years, 1985 was not too terrific for the public ad agencies, reflecting a disappointing year in total ad spending. NM means not meaningful. Source: Advertising Age.

[1]A&G's fiscal year actually ended June 30, 1985.
[2]Inclusive of the after-tax effect of $405,000 or 18 cents per share related to a bad debt write-off.

But noting that "in the industry's two largest categories, foods and autos, expenditures are up significantly," she noted that "in general, in analyzing the data, the industry appears healthy."

Mr. Dougherty's 1986 estimates call for a 9.5% increase in revenue to $2.86 billion for the major domestic ad agencies. "We expect their domestic revenue from commissions and fees to increase 9.4%, approximating the estimated domestic gains in 1985. These gains are sharply lower than the 18.1% compound annual growth in domestic revenue recorded between 1979 and 1984, reflecting what appears to be a shrinking spread between nominal GNP and total advertising and between total advertising and domestic revenue of the agencies that we follow."

"On the other hand," he said, "we believe that the agencies should produce their sharpest gain in foreign revenues in several years. Contributing to this forecast is a general weakening of the U.S. dollar relative to most of the world's important currencies beginning in the third quarter of 1985."

The big question hanging over the public ad agencies in 1986, however, will be the fate of Foote, Cone & Belding Communications. Long-time ad agency stock analyst Alan Gottesman of L.F. Rothschild, Unterberg, Towbin, noted of the FCB situation, in which Shamrock Holdings continues to increase its shares (AA, March 10): "Are we seeing the first round of takeover fever hit this industry? Probably. Is it a communicable disease caught from the media stocks? Probably. Can an ad agency actually be taken over? The answer is yes, in our view."

But while takeovers have now emerged as a possibility, Mr. Gottesman considered it "only modestly" to be likely. "There are rarely hidden assets, special tax benefits, synergistic promise or other buried treasure" in an ad agency, he said. "Land mines, maybe, but not treasure. The economics are straightforward, but their projection unreliable. And while the staff may stay, the clients may not. A whole-hog investor from outside has less certainty for earning a return in excess of capital costs and risk premiums—considering these stocks' present levels—in the ad agency business than in many other fields."#

Panasonic shifts account to C&W

By BRIAN MORAN

Panasonic has shifted $10 million to $15 million worth of billings for its electronic typewriters and copiers to Cunningham & Walsh from Ted Bates Advertising, in a move that consolidates the company's office-products advertising with one agency.

For New York-based C&W, the move, effective June 1, will more than double the agency's billings from Secaucus, N.J.-based Panasonic.

C&W last summer picked up Panasonic's $5 million-to-$10 million computer products from Grey Advertising due to a potential conflict at that agency.

Bates, New York, continues to handle Panasonic's $25 million-plus consumer electronics account. Bates had held responsibility for typewriters and copiers since three years ago, when the client formed a separate division, Panasonic Industrial Co., to market those products, said Frank Novak, general manager-advertising.

Mr. Novak said Bates' handling of home computer marketer Commodore International Ltd. kept the agency out of the running for Panasonic's computer business and that C&W's recent work on that account helped trigger the present switch.

Panasonic has been expanding its typewriter and copier business and plans several new-product introductions this summer which will receive major ad support via C&W, Mr. Novak said. At the Consumer Electronics Show in January, Panasonic introduced a $229 thermal transfer typewriter that lets users type vertically as well as horizontally.

Grey resigned the Panasonic computer account last August because of a potential product conflict from another client, Lake Success, N.Y.-based Canon USA. Grey continues to handle Panasonic's line of batteries and some industrial video products.#

CASTLE & COOKE, San Francisco, has narrowed the review for its $25 million account to incumbents Allen & Dorward and J. Walter Thompson USA; New York shops Della Femina, Travisano & Partners, William Esty Co. and Scali, McCabe, Sloves, and the Los Angeles office of Ogilvy & Mather. Also, C&C has formed Dole Food Co. as a separate subsidiary in a restructuring that puts new emphasis on international marketing.

HASBRO, Pawtucket, R.I., will not make specific toy-line assignments to newly chosen second agency Needham Harper Worldwide (AA, March 10) for about three weeks. More than $15 million in billings is involved. "The bulk" of Needham's work will appear in 1987, though the agency may handle "some" '86 advertising, said Al Carosi, Hasbro vp-marketing. Griffin Bacal, New York, remains Hasbro's primary agency.

TENNECO AUTOMOTIVE RETAIL, Houston, today breaks the first campaign created by SSC&B:Lintas Worldwide, New York, for Tenneco's two North American chains, Speedy Muffler King and Car-X. Four 30-second tv spots, emphasizing the chains' friendliness and fast service, will run in the Midwest and northeastern U.S. and nationally in Canada. SSC&B took over the account from Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt.

HAWORTH INC., a Holland, Mich.-based office products company, last week kicked off its first network and cable tv campaign. The $1.7 million effort, touting the strength of Haworth's office furniture, also includes print ads in major architectural and interior design magazines. Korey Kay & Partners, New York, handles.

CORNING GLASS WORKS' consumer products division, Corning, N.Y., is unveiling a $6 million campaign for its Corelle dinnerware. The print effort, breaking in April magazines, highlights the new design of Corelle. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, handles.

KMG MAIN HURDMAN, New York, the country's No. 9 accounting firm, in a new $1 million print campaign pitches its worldwide presence in 71 countries. Ads will appear in Business Week, Forbes, Fortune and in European business magazines. Saatchi & Saatchi Compton handles.

ED BIANCHI last week was named best commercials director of 1985 by the Directors Guild of America, Los Angeles. The director, who owns Bianchi Films, New York, was cited for "Foward pass," the Diet Pepsi spot with Joe Montana and Dan Marino (via BBDO); American Express Co.'s "Young lawyer" (Ogilvy & Mather), and "Jump" for Procter & Gamble's Bounce (D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles).

COCA-COLA USA, Atlanta, has chosen Salt Lake City and New York as the test markets for the April introduction of diet Cherry Coke. National rollout will occur later this year. McCann-Erickson, New York, will support with a multimedia campaign.

TYSON FOODS, Springdale, Ark., has moved its premium frozen chicken dinners into national distribution. The line was in 25% of the U.S. last summer (AA, Sept. 9). Noble & Associates, Springfield, Mo., backs with network tv, couponing and point-of-purchase. Also, Tyson is testing three more chicken entrees expected to join the national line this fall.

DART & KRAFT'S Kraft subsidiary, Glenview, Ill., this month goes national with its six-item Sauceworks line. It has been testing in 10 markets since last fall (AA, Sept. 26). Magazine ads and couponed freestanding newspaper inserts support, via J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago.

KELLOGG CO., Battle Creek, Mich., has added a peanut butter and jelly flavor to its Pop-Tarts toaster pastry line. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, handles. Also, Kellogg has replaced Dig 'Em, the bouncy, talking frog who's been hawking its Honey Smacks cereal, with Wally Bear. Network tv, via Burnett, broke March 3.

PROCTER & GAMBLE, Cincinnati, is introducing nationally "Carry and Dispose Pouches" for its Always Maxi and Thin Maxi feminine napkins. Print ads running in April women's magazines are themed "Now it's easier than ever to take Always with you." D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, handles.

A.C. NIELSEN CO., Northbrook, Ill., shows NBC-TV dominating most major age/sex breakouts in prime time in the ratings company's demographic data from Sept. 23 through Feb. 9. NBC also is the only network improving from a year ago in the regularly scheduled prime time programing data. CBS held even with its year-ago adult, teen and children viewers, as ABC declined in all categories but children. Separately, preliminary data for 22 Nielsen and 17 Arbitron Co. markets in the February sweeps books show NBC leading CBS.

O-t-c capsule terrorism escalates

Is product security realistic?

An Advertising Age roundup

Last week's tampering with three SmithKline Beckman Corp. over-the-counter capsule products confirmed the worst fears of package-goods marketers and retailers —that product terrorism was not limited to Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol.

The sabotaging of some packages of Philadelphia-based SmithKline's Contac, Teldrin allergy-relief medicine and Dietac appetite suppressants—followed by the company's decision March 21 to recall capsule forms of all three brands after traces of rat poison were discovered in two Contac capsules—differed notably from last month's Tylenol poisoning episode that left one person dead in New York. Since the SmithKline episode appeared to have been inspired by the Tylenol case, fears that a "copy cat" epidemic could occur haunted marketers as never before.

Analysts said public reaction will play a large part in determining the future of over-the-counter capsule sales.

Oleh Denysyk, a drug analyst with Charles H. Kline & Co., Fairfield, N.J., said, "I think it's the end of capsules without any seals on them.

"It'll definitely help the caplet dosage form," Mr. Denysyk said. "The major manufacturers will change some of their product formulations. There are some companies that have to be concerned." A time-release product such as Contac, however, can only be made in capsule form.

Other than SmithKline, the companies that rely most on capsules are Thompson Medical Co., New York, and Chattem Inc., Chattanooga, Tenn., although most major analgesics and some cold remedies also are available in capsule form as well as tablets. More than 70% of Thompson's sales come from diet capsules that are not now sold as tablets. Officials from Thompson and Chattem could not be reached for comment.

Product terrorism took two new turns last week. First, the purported tampering was a calculated

Herb helped BK visibility, but little else

By BRIAN MORAN

Burger King Corp.'s $40 million Herb campaign failed to build sales, win significant numbers of new customers or clearly position the No. 2 hamburger chain's image, according to BK president Jay Darling.

But Mr. Darling and BK agency J. Walter Thompson USA say the four-month campaign succeeded in one goal—increasing Burger King's visibility.

In an interview following the March 13 windup of the campaign, Mr. Darling confirmed sales in January rose a scant 1% compared with January, 1985. Originally, BK executives hoped Herb would boost January sales by up to 10%.

Mr. Darling declined to quantify February sales during the height of the $1-million "Search for Herb" sweepstakes created by JWT, except to say they were "disappointing." But Wall Street analysts estimate sales were flat or up perhaps 1% at most.

Miami-based BK isn't alone in encountering tough going in the fast-food market. According to Prudential-Bache Securities estimates, average per-store sales for Dublin, O.-based Wendy's International, the No. 3 chain, were down 10.5% (year-to-year) in December, off 9% for the fourth quarter as a whole and

Network sitcoms make comeback in fall schedules

By JAMES P. FORKAN and VERNE GAY

Comedy is back as king.

The situation comedy, a format declared passe only two years ago, before "The Cosby Show" started racking up 50-plus shares, will dominate the network airwaves next fall, especially on NBC and CBS.

All three networks last week hosted advertising and agency executives in Los Angeles to screen clips or hear descriptions of the 80 pilots now in production for fall, when the networks are expected to replace about 20 hours of prime time programing. ABC is expected to replace eight hours, CBS (which needs considerable help in its 8 p.m. [ET] time slot) should replace seven hours and NBC will change between four and six hours.

The networks' rekindled love affair with the sitcom has significant ramifications for many advertisers, especially marketers targeting a male audience. Sitcoms traditionally score much better with women and children than with men. In recent seasons, action dramas such as "Miami Vice" and "Hill Street Blues" have succeeded in luring the male viewer into prime time in record numbers.

The trend was so strong that several traditional sports advertisers started shifting budgets away from sports and into prime time, a daypart that was emerging as a more cost-efficient way to advertise to men. Those advertisers, which include big-spending categories such as beer, automotive, financial services, computers and even fast-food restaurants, once again could find sports to be a better buy.

That should be welcome news to the networks, which have been suffering under an exceptionally soft sports market, but it could restrict the media options open to male-

A-B agencies wary; Chi shops eye Heileman

Riney brews agency beer blast

By SCOTT HUME

Hal Riney & Partners' abrupt resignation last week of $20 million in G. Heileman Brewing Co. business had Anheuser-Busch agencies looking over their shoulders and Chicago agencies lining up for the loose business.

The A-B shops got nervous after Heileman director of brand management Jim Legat said Riney had departed "to take on various unnamed Anheuser-Busch brands."

Don Ashley, senior vp-general manager at Riney & Partners' San Francisco home office, preferred to ascribe the split to "philosophical differences" (a reason echoed by Mr. Legat).

Although confirming that the agency "is exploring a relationship with another brewery," Mr. Ashley would not confirm A-B as its "intended."

The initial response from spokesmen at St. Louis-based A-B was "Heileman said what?" They had no further comment.

The No. 1 brewer's current agency stable includes D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis (corporate, Budweiser, LA, Natural Light); Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago (Bud Light, Busch, Michelob Classic Dark, Michelob Light); Ted Bates Advertising/New York (Michelob); Bloom Agency, Dallas (Baybry's cooler, Saratoga and Sante mineral waters); TBWA, St. Louis (Eagle snacks, Carlsberg import); JP Martin Associates, New York (King Cobra malt liquor), and Adamson Advertising, St. Louis (Master Cellars wine).

The question is: Who would lose what at A-B to make room for Riney?

The only major brand officially in limbo is Michelob,

It was a year that produced some top-notch tv commercials, but excellence in 1985 was a matter of execution rather than innovation. That was the conclusion of a panel of editors that looked at a record 1,600 commercials and selected Advertising Age's Best Tv Commercials of 1985.

Auto marketing worldwide 80
An overview of global automobile marketing presents case studies from Australia, Brazil, Canada and China and a portfolio of international auto ads, critiqued by John O'Toole, former chairman and ceo of Foote, Cone & Belding. Global strategies by car makers are hampered by media restrictions around the world, varying customs in naming cars and the fact that car buyers express their personalities in their purchases. Marketers face an array of sales methods, and must satisfy people who buy cars for many reasons, and those reasons vary from country to country.

Grey locks up to block buyouts

By STEWART ALTER

New York—Grey Advertising has become the second publicly owned ad agency in a month to strengthen itself against takeover attempts.

Grey stockholders were summoned to a special meeting March 21 in Minneapolis to establish a new class of voting shares, making any takeover more difficult.

Foote, Cone & Belding Communications earlier took anti-takeover steps by distributing a preferred-stock purchase right on each outstanding share of the company's common stock (AA, March 10).

The moves reflect a major change in agency attitudes about unfriendly takeovers.

"In today's environment, your advertising or marketing dollars have to be far more focused, far more targeted," Mr. Sandefur told a briefing for the trade press.

New 'Angel Love' gives comic book twist to real-life situations

Her boyfriend abuses cocaine. Her best friend has an unplanned pregnancy. Her mother is dying of cancer, and only her long-lost sister can help her.

A new afternoon soap opera? Your next-door neighbor's best kept secrets?

No, it's "Angel Love," a new comic by Barbara Slate, the New York-based creator of the feminist comic strip "Ms. Liz," which has appeared in animated form on NBC-TV's "Today."

"Angel Love," Slate's first full-length comic book, is the story of an aspiring New York artist who works three days a week as a waitress in the Balloon, a trendy restaurant. Angel lives with Wendy, a spoiled, naive woman from a wealthy Long Island family. Angel's closest friends are Everett, a black musician, and Cindy, another waitress at the restaurant.

Life isn't easy for Angel, but she's strong, stubborn and funny, and even her disastrous dating life doesn't stop her from falling in love on a rather regular basis.

Despite its adult situations, Slate says the comic is written for young people, 11 to 18 years old. It's the "after-Archie crowd," she says. "I write to 11-year-olds the way I would write to adults. Anything else would be talking down to them. These problems are part of real life."

Slate also came to New York as an aspiring artist almost 20 years ago and did her share of struggling, but "Angel Love" is not autobiographical. If anything, it is a case of life imitating art rather than vice versa.

"Gosh, I hope it isn't autobiographical. Angel has her share of problems," Slate says. "Actually, I imitate the way she dresses—as much as I can get away with, considering the age difference."

DC Comics, New York, begins monthly publication of the eight-issue "Angel Love" series at the end of April.

Videocassettes woo teens away from theaters

Throw in a tape, pass the popcorn and curl up on the couch: The living room is fast becoming the teen hot spot for that Saturday night date at the movies.

According to a recent study by Market Facts, Chicago, 40% of feature film viewing is done with videocassette recorders, mostly by the 10-to-19-year-old segment that was, until recently, movie theaters' biggest draw.

"There must be a rapid increase in vcr dates among America's teen agers," says Mike Freehill, vp, Market Facts. "Faced with the rising costs of attending a theater movie, teens are renting movies, gathering with friends and saving their money. This represents a dramatic social change for teen agers and will have an even bigger impact on the industry once these youngsters reach their 20s."

The study reports movie theater attendance in the U.S. has peaked and predicts box office receipts will continue to decline. Receipts could be down 20% by 1988 unless Hollywood releases a significant number of blockbuster films and finds an innovative movie theater marketing approach.

"If the teens are gone, the movie industry will need to produce pictures attractive to the neglected markets, such as the 50-year and over age group," Freehill says.

One area that hasn't been hurt by the vcr is the pay-tv market. Subscribers are using vcrs to record pay-tv movies for later viewing.

In April, the Movie Channel pay-tv subscriber service will launch "VCR Theatre" aimed directly at vcr owners. Every day at 3 a.m. the service will repeat its best film of the day for taping. The movies will be changed weekly instead of monthly so films will not repeat as often.

To make matters worse for movie theaters, it's inevitable that theatrical releases in the future will hit the theaters at the same time their vcr versions will hit the stores, Freehill says.

It may be time for a remake of "The Last Picture Show."

Luxurious look fits, feels like your own skin

"I grew up in a world of affluence," says Jeffie Pike. "I saw people who were able to buy a dress that cost $1,000 and was covered with little seed pearls and designed by Dior that they'd never wear again—and this is my answer to that."

Pike's "answer" is J'Attoos, skin decals designed to look like sumptuous jewelry. A sixth-generation Californian with a string of fashion connections as long (and showy) as the rub-on necklaces she's designed, Pike insists, "Throwaway glamor on the budget of a schoolgirl is the most luxurious feeling in the world!"

To apply the decal, one selects the desired bauble from a small sheet and places it on the neck, ankle, wrist or face. A dab from a wet sponge transfers it to the skin where it glitters in gold and turquoise squares, or scatters in a daisy petal design, or rocks as '60s yellow, red and black love beads. J'Attoos come in 18 designs, so far. They can be removed with the aid of baby oil or cellophane tape.

Jewelry designers and makeup artists create the J'Attoo patterns, and it is somewhere between jewelry and makeup that J'Attoos must be defined. Bloomingdale's, for instance, is introducing the line in its cosmetics department. But, says Pike, of Los Angeles, "I think they're jewelry." Macy's, Bullock's, Jordan Marsh and other upscale department stores also will be carrying them, she says.

Each packet costs $3.50, with more elaborate designs, such as reproductions of actual crown jewels, planned for $5 packets later. No ads are planned because, says Pike, "I don't think that fads get started by advertising."

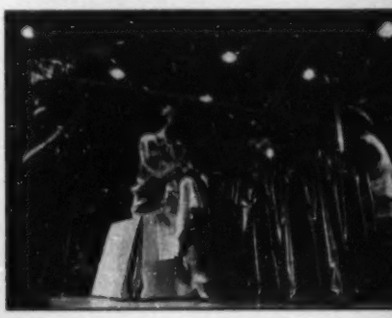
Interior designers create showcases for apparel

Fashion thought for the day: Your "where" may exert influence on your "wear"—and vice versa.

Today, individual style doesn't necessarily begin and end with "ready-to-wear fashion and jewelry. What you wear can give an indication of what's in your environment," says Sandy Kagan, l. Magnin's Midwest fashion director in Chicago. The fashion retailer is giving expression to this idea in "Lifestyles: A salute to Chicago Is" in its Michigan Ave. store.



Vignette by Marilyn Rose; fashion by Mark Heister. It depicts one woman's fashion attitudes and sense of self.

Located on various floors in the store are "environmental life-style vignettes" designed by 10 of Chicago's top interior designers, all members of the American Society of Interior Designers. The small but striking spaces showcase new looks in apparel and jewelry from the city's fashion designers. The monthlong event ties in with the annual "Chicago Is" fashion show held last week at the Apparel Mart.

The wedding of interior and fashion design was conceived by Marilyn Rose, president of Rose Interiors Ltd., Lincolnwood, Ill., who also created the vignette atop l. Magnin's first-floor jewlery display case. The art deco set features two vanities. Peering into the double mirror are two mannequins in gowns by Mark Heister.

The vignettes' moods range from the fashion-forward and contemporary to the elegant and romantic: A delicately etched acrylic screen by Lori Lennon forms a backdrop for a Becky Bisoulis bridal gown. Ethel Samuels' Oriental setting, highlighted by a wood and metal Empress chair, provides the exotic touch for a Kanae dress.

"This concept in visual merchandising operates on several levels," Rose says. "It showcases the city's talent and shows the public the growing relationship between interior design and fashion. And people can see what can be done in small spaces.

"Today, you have high-tech clothes, clothes with lines reflected in architecture, furnishings," Rose says. "Look at gold and silver accessories, for example, and high-gloss, lacquered furniture so popular today. One sets off the other."

Rose approached Kagan in December

Links with general shops boost DM agency billings

By PAUL L. EDWARDS

NEW YORK—Direct-marketing agencies continued to benefit from their general-agency affiliations last year, according to the annual survey of billings released by the Direct Marketing Assn.'s research department.

With only one exception—Direct Inc., the direct-marketing subsidiary of D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles—affiliated direct agencies continued to post strong results.

Wunderman, Ricotta & Kline, a Young & Rubicam subsidiary, continues to lead the pack, but not by much. Ogilvy & Mather Direct closed to within less than $3 million of taking the lead.

Of the major agency direct-marketing subsidiaries, DFS Direct made the best gain, jumping 116.8% from 1984 to $25.8 million in 1985.

Two of the top ten in 1985 were independent, privately held agencies, one more than the previous year. Neither will have that distinction this year. While Barry Blau & Partners, Fairfield, Conn., remains independent of a general agency, it went public at the end of last year. And Kobs & Brady Advertising, Chicago, becomes a subsidiary of Ted Bates April 1.

When he announced his decision to join with Bates (AA, March 10), Mr. Kobs said one of the reasons was that direct-marketing agencies need to be affiliated with a general agency in order to sustain growth.

DMA continued this year to distinguish between agencies reporting fees and commission only and those reporting internal production revenues as well. Some of the latter include Direct Marketing Group, which counts revenue attributable to its print shop, and Direct Marketing Agency, Westport, Conn., which counts revenue from its computer facility.#

Junk the 'junk mail' stigma

By JOHN FRANCIS TIGHE

In my last column, the vice-chairman of Ogilvy & Mather International implied that people don't like junk mail.

Drayton Bird's exact words and intonations were: "People actually tend to be more affected by advertising they like." To which I riposted: "The public votes with its dollars."

My point was that as long as we can split-test print and direct-mail response with keyed coupons and reply cards, we don't need expensive research to tell us which advertising the public likes. I am waiting for this gleaming insight to be rediscovered with hosannas by corporate and agency yuppies.

Meanwhile, I am not opposed to research—in fact, I welcome it—except to tell me which ad will work best. This is not its proper function.

J. Tighe

Research has helped me enormously in business-to-business mail marketing. One of these columns, I will show you how to use it to create breakthroughs.

But getting back to this question of which advertising the public likes, what we are really talking about is which advertising the Big Bucks clients and their agencies like. Or more accurately, dislike. Particularly in direct mail.

The fact is, they don't like mail at all. It makes them nervous. They don't understand it. It's not "media," like tv. They're embarrassed by it. And they're even more embarrassed because people keep calling it junk mail.

This despite the Direct Marketing Assn.'s findings that " 'junk mail' is used [by the public] as a descriptive rather than critical term for mass mailings. . .often an affectionate term."

Recently, I was talking to Tom Collins, the co-founder of Rapp & Collins, about the abhorrence exhibited by most direct-marketing agencies for the "Reader's Digest school" of direct mail.

As an agency principal, Tom was sympathetic. But, as he pointed out, "They have not established that they can do a more successful sweepstakes promotion without all that gingerbread. . .Reader's Digest said 'Hey! What if we put a little red seal there—what'll that do? Oh look—that works!

" 'What if we use shadow lettering? What does that do? Oh, that works, too!'

"And because they never give up the old mailing until the new mailing has beaten it, much of the stuff that you see is the product of 30 years' evolution."

Don't get me wrong. I don't hate good design. I just love good results. I've said before that one of the most gifted and innovative graphic designers in direct marketing is Heikki Ratalahti, whose partner is copywriter Bill Jayme.

But Bill and Heikki specialize in a very specific type of mail. I'm not sure they could do a successful sweepstakes mailing. And they would tell you that they wouldn't be caught dead trying.

As Tom Collins remarked in our conversation (on which I'll report at greater length in a future column), "Different problems require different solutions."#

Copywriter/consultant Mr. Tighe is known in direct-marketing circles as one of the most successful free lancers. Based in New York, he serves clients throughout the U.S. and Canada.

Business shops get DMA group

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO.—The Direct Marketing Assn. has created its fourth special-interest group, this one serving the needs of business-to-business direct marketers.

Business-to-Business Leaders was born at the DMA's spring conference here, the third such group created since Jonah Gitlitz took office as president. Catalog Leaders was formed three years ago. List Leaders and the Television Direct Response group were added last year.

Each group is intended to increase participation of senior-level executives in the association's ac-

Agency income surges 15.3%

Worldwide gross income of U.S. agencies rose 15.3% to $8.17 billion in 1985 and billings climbed 15.9% to $55.8 billion for the ADVERTISING AGE 500 leading agencies. But even with such improvements, the year-to-year swing was down from growth recorded from 1983 to 1984 primarily because of a stagnation in agency activity in foreign markets.

Growth in non-U.S. gross income dropped from the 13.7% reached in 1984 over the prior year to 3.2% in 1985, rubbing out the 19.6% gain in U.S. gross income, the largest such gain in the past 10 years. The growth rate recorded in 1984 was a 17.1% increase in both worldwide gross income and billings over the prior year.

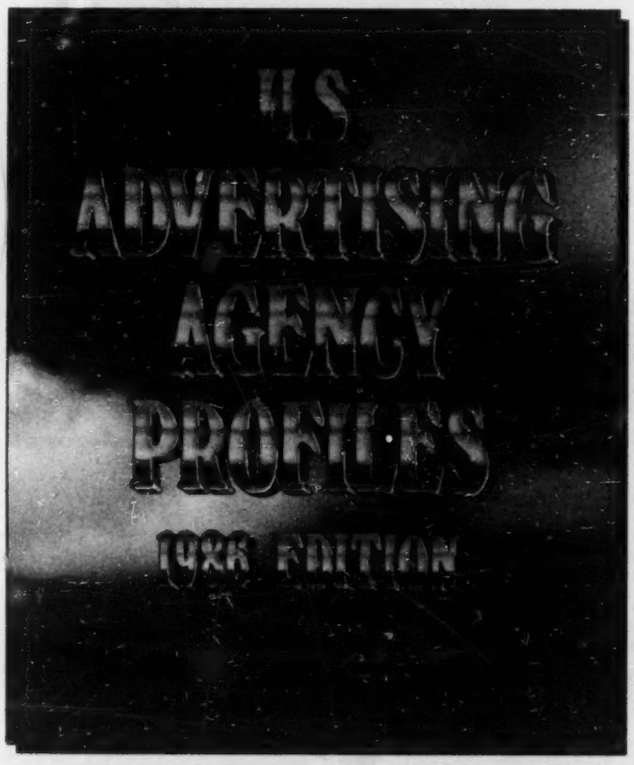
Again leading all agencies in world gross income in this 42nd annual Agency Income Report was Young & Rubicam with $536 million on billings of $3.58 billion, both 11.7% increases over 1984. However, Ogilvy Group's $481.1 million in world income passed Ted Bates Worldwide for the No. 2 spot in that category. Ogilvy had passed Bates in worldwide billings in 1984 and maintained that lead with its $3.32 billion contribution compared with $3.11 billion for Bates.

This issue is the first in which editors established an AD AGE 500 barometer. This 500 agency index accounted for 43.2% of the $95.84 billion in total U.S. advertising in 1985 as measured by Robert J. Coen, senior vp-director of forecasting at McCann-Erickson. The 500 also were responsible for an estimated 70% of all advertising placed advertiser by agencies, media buying houses and in-house buying units.

This year, 690 agencies' figures were accepted for publication. While profiles were published for each agency, only the figures for the top 500 were included in composites. Cutoff for the 500 in 1985 was $1.05 million in gross income, which is equivalent to about $7.8 million in billings.

Among the top 10 agencies, Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide continued to climb the charts, rising a notch to No. 4 in world billings and No. 5 in world income on the basis of a 31.8% increase in billings and 30.6% increase in gross income—growth credited to major acquisitions abroad.

Saatchi dropped two places from 1984 to No. 10 in U.S. gross income. One reason for the slip was the invasion of the top 10 charts by D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles on the basis of the mid-1985 merger between D'Arcy MacManus Masius and Benton & Bowles. Separately, the two agencies ranked 12th and 14th in 1984 in world gross income. But the DMB&B combine in 1985 ranked seventh among U.S. agencies in U.S. income and eighth in world income, world billings and non-U.S. billings.



The Ad Age 500 has grown from $11.9 billion to $41.4 billion in U.S advertising in 10 years and accounts for 70% of all U.S. media billings placed through a second party.

Hot shops

Growth in worldwide gross income at Griffin-Bacal exploded behind one of its clients, toy monolith Hasbro Inc., clocking in at 150.3% over 1984. This sent the New York-based agency from No. 119 in 1984 to No. 59 in worldwide gross income in 1985, firmly establishing the agency as the fastest growing shop in the country. However, there may be some erosion in that business in 1986 because Hasbro, has assigned Needham Harper Worldwide part of its account.

Within striking distance of Transformer-conscious Griffin-Bacal was Fallon McElligott Rice with a 148.1% increase in worldwide gross income, which elevated the Minneapolis shop from No. 165 in 1984 to No. 79.

Other sizable gainers in the top 10 performers in worldwide income on a year-to-year basis were Rumrill-Hoyt, New York, up 59.5%; Chiat/Day, Los Angeles, up 58.8%; Ammirati & Puris, New York, up 44.4%; Richards Group, Dallas, up 39.1%; Towne, Silverstein Rotter, New York, up 37.3%; DBG&H Unlimited, Dallas, up 35.8%; Kobs & Brady Advertising, Chicago, up 32.2%, and Saatchi, up 30.6%.

Such performances by Kobs & Brady and FMR did not go unnoticed. Meteoric growth at Kobs & Brady was not lost on Bates, its new parent as of March, 1986, a month after FMR was bought by Scali, McCabe, Sloves. Peripatetic clients and big bucks, however, have a tendency to reduce fast-track agencies one year to slow-boat takers the next. Growth leader in 1984—Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein—suffered a drop of 10.4% in worldwide billings in 1985, which LGFE execs credit to "a natural course correct following explosive growth."

Ohlmeyer Advertising, fast becoming solely an in-house agency for R.J. Reynolds Industries, continued to lead all agencies in productivity with 0.52 people per $1 million in 1985 billings, improving on its 0.56 performance in 1984.

U.S. media growth

U.S. media billings rose 19.4% to $35.44 billion in 1985 among the 500. Total U.S. billings among the 500 actually came in at $41.37 billion. The $5.93 million difference is attributed to agencies that did not break out total advertising volume into the various media. The smaller media billings figure is used to arrive at percentages of its 14 contributing media components. Agencies in the Interpublic Group of Cos. and Saatchi were among those not providing media breakouts.

The $35.44 billion volume was paced by network tv's $9.96 billion, a 10.4% increase from the year earlier. Spot tv was a notch behind at $7.7 billion in total dollar volume, up 22.4%.

Very little network tv buying trickled down to agencies below the top 100, which accounted for 95.3% of the network tv spending. The top 100 agencies also bought 80.5% of spot tv, 86.6% of cable, and 80.1% of outdoor. They also accounted for 74.7% of all media purchased by the 500.

Among the top 10 agencies, which as a unit claimed more than half the network tv billings of the 500, three agencies spent less on network tv in 1985 than in 1984.

Ogilvy Group, the biggest network tv spender, and Young & Rubicam, the No. 2 tv spender, each spent 13% less in the medium than they did the previous year. These two agencies together accounted for 16% of the 500's network tv billings, down from 20% in 1984. The only other top 10 agency to register a decline in spending in the medium was DMB&B, whose network tv billings suffered an 8.7% erosion. Network tv spending in 1985 did not have the luxury of a summer Olympics or presidential election year as it did in 1984.

Y&R grabbed the top spot in spot tv, followed by Foote, Cone & Belding, which was the leading newspaper spender. Ogilvy came in at No. 6 in spot tv, spending less in that medium than it spent in magazines, a medium it led with a 33% increase in billings. Over-all, the 500 increased newspaper spending 14.8% to $3.45 billion and magazine spending 18.8% to $5.8 billion.

Direct response advertising had the largest increase among the media monitored—57.5% to $2.08 billion—figures representing a composite of Yellow Pages, direct mail, catalogs, direct response tv, radio, newspapers and magazines, telemarketing and free-standing inserts. Of the direct response total, direct mail took 53.2% and Yellow Pages 23.4% of the composite pie.

Cable tv, the newest of the media reported, showed the second biggest year-to-year increase in spending, up 56.4% to $414.8 million in 1985.

Point of sale, accounting for a relatively small $181.5 million among the 500 agencies, increased 34.8%. Outdoor had the smallest increase—4.9% to $894.8 million—among the 14 media monitored. (See composite media chart on Page 94.)

Mergers

The agency business replicated the buyout madness affecting U.S. industry as a whole in 1985, accelerating the rush toward dominance of the industry by a select few. The top 10 agencies, for example, account for 49% of the advertising bought by the Ad Age 500.

Lorimar Group, which purchased Bozell & Jacobs in 1985, merged it in January, 1986, with its Kenyon & Eckhardt unit bought in 1984. Together, they ranked 14th in world gross income.

Candidate for the Advertising Age Agency of the Year, No. 72 Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver, became part of Grey Advertising. In addition to its creative excellence, LHS&B had a prosperous year, rising from No. 85 in 1984. Ross Roy in Detroit bought No. 150 Griswold Inc. of Cleveland. Backer & Spielvogel got AdCom Inc., the one-time in-house agency for Quaker Oats Co. in Chicago. AdCom ranked 117th in worldwide gross income in 1984. HBM/Creamer purchased Albert Jay Rosenthal, Chicago.

Agency concentration continued in full force in early 1986. Already Sieber & McIntyre, the Chicago-based healthcare shop ranked No. 77, has been bought by No. 7 McCann of the Interpublic Group of Cos. Interpublic's Marschalk Co. has merged with Lowe Howard-Spinks in the U.K., and added some of the Campbell-Ewald worldwide offices to the new Lowe Marschalk network with estimated billings of $550 million.

Fallon McElligott Rice, No. 79, was purchased by No. 28 Scali, McCabe, Sloves, a subsidiary of No. 2 Ogilvy Group. Boston-based No. 75 Ingalls Associates was grabbed up by No. 6 BBDO International and merged with BBDO's Boston shop, Quinn & Johnson. Bates, No. 3, went on a buying binge this March, taking No. 93 Kobs & Brady, and is seeking to close a buyout deal with Conill Advertising, a leading New York Hispanic agency.

The biggest merger in 1986 so far has been the DFS Dorland Worldwide linkup in which Saatchi's U.K. subsidiary, Dorland Advertising, merged with Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York. The DFS Dorland network will account for billings of $1.5 billion.

Ad specialty shops

Specialty shops, especially Hispanic and direct marketing units, continued to attract attention of general agencies, whether mutations from within or by acquisition.

Hispanic advertising, estimated at $333.5 million in 1985 for a 17.2% increase from the previous year, has been gathering steam as advertisers get more solid numbers on the market. Bates' courtship of Conill Advertising is expected to reach the altar in early 1986. Davis, Johnson, Mogul & Colombatto's in Los Angeles formed Ad Latina from within and Kornhauser & Calene affiliated with Garrido Group.

Direct response agencies are flourishing, reflecting the growth in that ad medium. Direct mail advertising, the largest sector in direct response, was expected to increase 11% in 1985 to $15.3 billion, according to Mr. Coen at McCann. The big agencies are going after direct response business like vultures on a carcass. Kobs & Brady is the big buy, going to Bates in 1986. Doyle Dane Bernbach grabbed Direct Response Group, Dallas. Hicks & Greist has built up its direct marketing staff to 20 from half that a year ago; Al Paul Lefton says its 18-month-old direct response group is its fastest growth area along with pr; JWT formed J. Walter Thompson Direct in 1985, a composite of five direct response agencies. Ross Roy purchased direct response agency Lerner Scott Corp. in Chicago.

Other "specialty" brides were Sieber-McIntyre, bought by McCann, York/Alpern, Los Angeles, bought by DDB. No. 16 Needham Harper Worldwide bought Lane & Huff Advertising, a San Diego-based financial shop. N W Ayer, No. 18, entered the new year announcing to all its intention of expanding through specialty shop acquisition.

Non-U.S. influence

London proved the "in" place for U.S. agency activity in 1985. No. 46 Doremus moved into the English capital to service 11 U.S.-based clients and seek new business. No. 58 Direct Marketing Group formed D.M. Group Ltd., No. 55 Medicus Intercon purchased ADA Group, and No. 38 Hill Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos merged with Aspect Ltd., London.

Saatchi's acquisition of Grandfield, Rork, Collins; Marschalk's merger with Lowe Howard-Spinks, and WRG/London's merger with Holmes, Knight, Ritchie to form HKR/WRG completes the invasion.

Over-all, the 500's activity in foreign markets was off, their non-U.S. gross income slipping from 26% of the worldwide total in 1984 to 23% in 1985. This flattening was attributed to a strong dollar and depressed economies in the Pacific basin, Latin America and select European markets.

Regional ad power

Regional concentration of advertising is not a question of what markets comprise that concentration, but just how big the business is in New York, which is also headquarters of 28 of Advertising Age's top 100 media companies. New York claimed 35% of the Ad Age 500's U.S. billings. New York totals of $19.44 billion in billings were from 209 shops. The agencies in that city accounted for 91.4% of total non-U.S. billings reported by U.S. agencies.

A parent agency's billings were broken out by cities in this issue to arrive at an accurate estimation of billings' concentration per market. Most of the carving, of course, was done on New York-based agencies. New York is even more dominant than the numbers show because many central offices pull media strings for certain clients serviced elsewhere.

Chicago remained the Second City with $4.26 billion in U.S. billings from 67 shops and accounted for most of the remaining 8.6% in non-U.S. billings not claimed by New York. Los Angeles came in third with $2.20 billion from 53 shops; followed by No. 4 Detroit, $1.75 billion from 20 shops; No. 5 Dallas, $893.3 million from 18 shops; No. 6 Minneapolis, $866.5 million from 23 shops; No. 7 San Francisco, $862.9 million from 31 shops; No. 8 Boston, $834.2 million from 27 shops; No. 9 Philadelphia, $603.9 million from 32 shops, and No. 10 Cleveland, $537.2 million from 17 shops. (See city chart on Page 75 for the top 25 ad markets.)

New York helped give the East 60% of total advertising reported by the Ad Age 500. The Midwest trailed with 24%, followed by 10% for the West Coast and 6% from the South. (See map on Page 109 for regional divisions.)

Power & trends among 500

As an index, the Ad Age 500 dominates total advertising placed by agencies in the U.S.

Total ad spending in 1985 estimated at $95.84 billion was broken down into $53.83 billion national advertising and $42.01 billion local advertising, estimates McCann's Mr. Coen. The 500's total ad billings of $41.4 billion, which is virtually all national advertising, accounts for 43% of the total, but in reality it amounts to a lot more because about $36 billion of those local ad dollars are not placed by agencies. This amount is attributed to local newspa-

Three finalists vie for Ad Age

The editors and staff of Advertising Age have selected three finalists for 1985 Agency of the Year.

They are Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago; Hill Holliday Connors Cosmopulos, Boston, and Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver, New York.

The winner will be announced April 22 at Advertising Age's Best Advertising Awards dinner at the Hyatt Regency Chicago hotel. At the dinner, a benefit for the Museum of Broadcast Communications, awards also will be announced for Best Television Commercials, Best Commercial Music, Best Director and Best Presenter.

Ad Age's annual selection of Agency of the Year is based on evaluation, by a committee of the publication's editors, of the creative product of the nominated agencies.

The creative product, rather than business success or accounts gained, is given primary attention to allow consideration of agencies of all sizes and types for the annual award.

The creative product can include copy, creative strategies, merchandising, media planning, research and related factors. An agency's growth and financial success is considered only to the extent that they reflect creative ex-

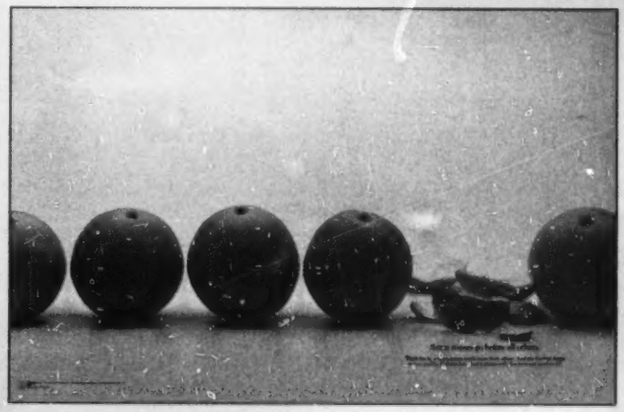
Levi's ads in both print and tv avoid the formula approach, using kicky, trendy formats to reach the younger audiences.

FCB Chicago breaks

Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, was nominated for a variety of creative advertising, including the much-talked-about spots for Coors beer featuring actor Mark Harmon. The "serial" concept has Mr. Harmon talking about various aspects of the Coors quality story. The spots break away from the usual "jocks in a bar" beer stereotype.

The second most popular FCB campaign among Ad Age staffers was Levi's 501 jeans tv spots, suggestive of music videos, featuring music with a strong beat and young men and women in city scenes. A similar type of commercial was used by FCB to introduce Coors in Canada—cool music and young adults.

The agency did not abandon the tug-at-the-heartstrings school, however,



Sunkist is the choice, suggests this eye-catching color spread for Sunkist Growers Inc. Its quality theme: "You have our word on it."

HHCC creates right answers

Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston, has been winning its share of creative awards, and its latest series for new client John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. is in line for more. The "Real life, real answers" campaign, which broke in late December and got maximum exposure on postseason football telecasts, features compelling vignettes of people in various stages of life with varying financial needs.

The campaign carries over into print, providing more information on the people featured in the tv spots.

Other creative efforts that drew attention from the Ad Age staff included the agency's trendy efforts for Jordan Marsh stores, the big-production Wang spots, Lotus software tv with a "You Made Me Love You" theme and innovative, lighthearted comparison ads for Ford dealer groups.

The Wang "Power & Glory" spot, set in an English cathedral, won a first-place award for HHCC in the Hatch awards competition of the Advertising Club of Greater Boston. It was one of 23 Hatch awards the agency won last year.

Agency president Jack Connors Jr. says the 18-year-old agency has blossomed into a full-service communications company, adding marketing research, pr, design and direct marketing to the creative attack. And in 18 months the agency's operation in New York has built a $26 million shop there, led by Malcolm MacDougall, formerly president of SSC&B:Lintas.

The agency last year also signed a merger agreement with Aspect Advertising in London and started a joint venture with an agency in Sydney.

People at various stages of their careers are highlighted in the agency's first tv campaign for John Hancock insurance services.

Stylish couple is featured in the continuing "This is the place" bouncy tv campaign for Boston's Jordan Marsh department store.

For the Ritz-Carlton, one of a number of the agency's Boston clients, print ads mix elegance with cool jazz and a hot fire in The Bar.

An organist trying out for a job in a vast cathedral is central in this Wang computer spot, which stresses the importance of people.

To break into the frozen bagel market, Sara Lee and the agency used tv spots of men and women getting positively sensuous over devouring a Bagel Time bagel.

cellence.

Nominations for Agency of the Year are submitted by staff members in all Ad Age bureaus. Staff nominations result from the monitoring of the advertising agency business throughout the year in the course of covering the news.

While primary emphasis is placed on nominations from staff members, careful consideration is given to candidacies advanced by the agencies themselves.

On these pages are brief summaries and portfolios of the three finalists, appearing in alphabetical order.

out the brainpower

with emotional spots for Kleenex and Pacific Bell reminiscent of FCB's much-lauded work for former client Hallmark Cards.

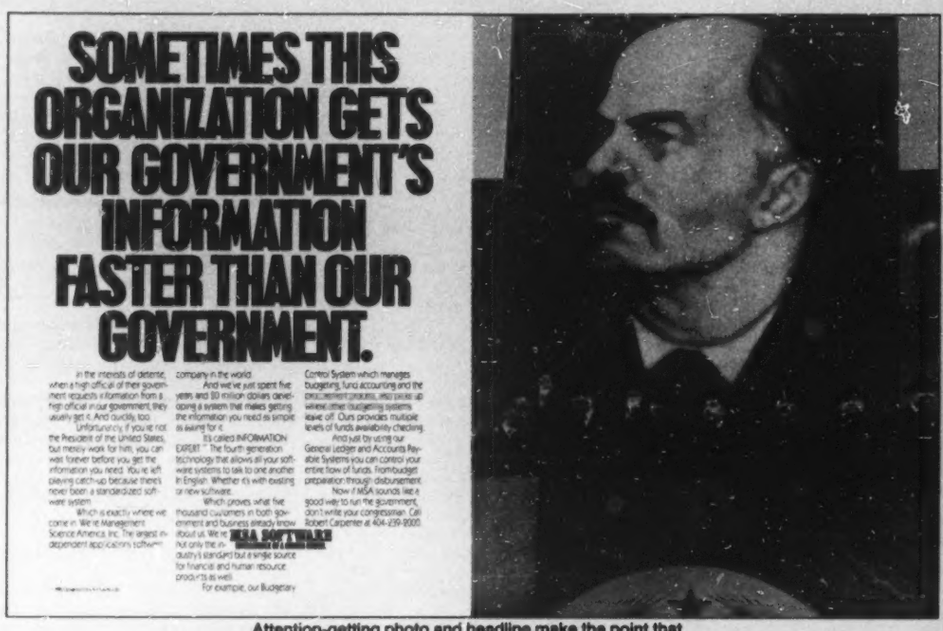
Other notable ads: Mazda using actor Jim Garner, Celestial Seasonings with Mariette Hartley for herbal teas, Long John Silver's ("Sounds good to me") and well-photographed food work for Denny's, California Raisin Board and Sara Lee's new Bagel Time bagels.

The work comes in the fifth year of Norman Brown's regime as chief executive officer of the agency. He has pushed the idea that agency management's job is to bring together the agency's "right-brain" (emotional, intuitive) and "left-brain" (analytical, reasoned) talents.

The very visible John O'Toole retired as chairman at the end of 1985, and Mr. Brown shuffled his management team, naming Abbott Jones as president-chief operating officer. Later this year the agency will move its Chicago headquarters into its own new building on the city's near north side.

"Serial" tv spots for Coors feature popular actor Mark Harmon telling the beer's quality story. Here, he's near the company's Golden, Colo., plant.

Hill Holliday created this uptempo color spread for Lotus Development Corp.'s Jazz software for the Macintosh computer.



Attention-getting photo and headline make the point that MSA software systems can get information fast.

LHSB dependably humorous

Many of the campaigns that attracted Ad Age editors to Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver were variations on themes that were big award winners in 1984. The new executions haven't lost their winning form, AA's staffers believed.

Subaru tv includes humorous testimonials (top frame), and one highlighting durability that survives its users' rough treatment.

The campaign for Subaru in 1984 kept its "Inexpensive. And built to stay that way" dependability theme while stressing styling and appointments. In 1985 the campaign tilted back toward dependability, but with a humorous air and the underlying notion that "Americans love their cars, but hate to take care of them."

Examples of the campaign for Subaru: A driver backing out of his driveway and blissfully wiping out his and his neighbors garbage cans, a vacationer overstuffing the trunk and a bickering couple slamming car doors to punctuate their argument.

Among other LHSB ads that drew plaudits:

- The continuing radio campaign for Kronenbourg beer in which actor John Cleese carries on a running battle with "the No. 1 advertising disaster"—the beer's slogan, "Better, not bitter."
- The campaign for New York Air, which competes with Eastern Airlines for the New York to Washington shuttle business. One tv spot features a contortionist claiming the competition gives him plenty of seat room while he wraps his legs around the back of his neck.

When Grey Advertising acquired majority interest in the agency last July, Grey chairman Edward Meyer, paying tribute to Levine, Huntley's creativity, stated: "This sends a message to our world that this is where our money should go, that our heroes are creative people and those who do outstanding advertising."

New York Air's campaign goes head-to-head with Eastern for the lucrative Washington-N.Y. shuttle business.

Yoko Ono is among the leading lights who have appeared in this long-running image-changing print series for McCall's.

On tv, the agency touts New York Air's roominess by showing a contortionist who claims there is plenty of leg room on the competitor's aircraft.

Agency income surges 15.3%

pers, local radio and other miscellaneous advertising. There are some 3,000 ad agencies in the U.S.

Thus, of the $59.8 billion in advertising bought by an agent of some kind, the AD AGE 500 accounted for 70%. The rest can be largely credited to big in-house media buying units, independent media buyers and agencies not big enough to make the 500.

A 10-year tracking of the 500, drawn from the Agency Income Reports in each of the past 10 years, demonstrates a slow but steady concentration of the U.S. agency business.

U.S. billings among the top 25 agencies as ranked in 1985 have gone from 55.7% of total billings of the 500 in 1976 to 62.2% in 1985. Buying continues at a fevered pace in 1986, and informal merger discussions between ad industry giants are taking place. While there is little indication this trend toward concentration will abate the 1985 figures show a slight resistance among the midsized to smaller agencies for domination by the 25.

In 1985, the 62.2% share for the 25 was actually down from the 10-year high of 64.2% in 1984. These percentages folded into the buying power of the top 100 agencies also wash out to 79.5% of the 500 in U.S. billings, down from 83.6% in 1984. The dip indicates growth is shifting to the mass of midsized shops from $20 million to $60 million, many of which are in the emerging regional markets of the South and West.

Overlaying the annual increase in billings the past 10 years with the cost of prime time tv for the same period indicates how tied the agency business is to that medium. This is hardly a revelation. The chart on Page 107 illustrates how annual increases in tv unit prices have been a major component in increased billings over the past 10 years, and how that relationship has propelled industry growth well beyond the annual gross national product.

10-year averages

A 10-year review of the top 25 agencies of 1985 demonstrates the surge of Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide both domestically and outside the U.S. The 10-year retrospective of Saatchi begins in the U.S. under the name of Compton Inc. before its merger with the London Saatchi agency in 1982. Saatchi gross income has risen from $59 million in 1976 to $393.5 million in 1986 as billings increased from $393.5 million to $3.03 billion.

Such growth placed Saatchi at the head of the 25 in average annual worldwide and U.S. gross income growth with 26.2% and 29.9%, respectively. In average annual dollar volume growth, Saatchi led the charts in non-U.S. gross income and billings with $25.7 million and $170.1 million, respectively.

Not far behind Saatchi in average annual per cent change in worldwide gross income and billings was Backer & Spielvogel, with 25.8% for both. Scali, McCabe, Sloves was third in both categories with 23.9% and 24%, respectively. Scali had the biggest positive growth in gross income of 12.7% for a year-to-year period during the span of the decade. HCM suffered the biggest loss in a single year in gross income of 27.5%, which came in 1983 when Y&R sold the agency side of Marsteller to Eurocom while keeping the pr unit.

The 10-year review of average annual per cent change in U.S. gross income and billings reads much the same as those worldwide categories, except Bates moved ahead of Backer on the gross income chart with 26.0%, still distant to Saatchi's 29.9%. Bates ranked consistently high in most growth charts, helped along by active acquisition activity. Its purchase of William Esty in 1982, added to a strong performance that year at Bates, put the agency a notch behind Saatchi in the largest single-year growth in gross income of 80.8% to 80.9% for Saatchi.

The Ogilvy Group, which ranked fourth among the 25 agencies in average annual per cent change in U.S. gross income, had the largest minimum growth year with 12.3%.

The most volatile area of the agency business was in non-U.S. income and billings. Only the Ogilvy Group escaped the 10-year period without a drop in its overseas contribution in both billings and gross income for any year-to-year period. BJK&E was the lone agency to wind up with a negative growth rate in non-U.S. gross income and billings, turning in a negative for both annual per cent and annual volume change.

Scali, McCabe, Sloves led the 25 in average annual per cent change in non-U.S. gross income and billings with 73.4% and 70.2%, respectively, which was about 30 percentage points ahead of the runners-up in both categories. Scali's strength for the most part is a factor of smaller billings that helped produce maximum growth ranges to propel the 10-year average to the orbital sphere. Taking volume into account, Scali dropped to 16th among the 25 in non-U.S. average annual dollar volume change in gross income and billings, categories in which Saatchi far outdistanced its runner-up, Y&R. Saatchi averaged an annual volume growth in income of $25.7 million compared with $15.7 million by Y&R, and on the billings side, led with a $170.1 million average compared with Y&R's $104.7 million.

Only five of the 25 agencies had average annual growth rates for non-U.S. gross income above 10%—Saatchi, Y&R, McCann-Erickson, Bates and JWT—while only three had average volume growth in billings over $100 million—Saatchi, Y&R and Ogilvy—and three others registered annual volume rates in the $90 millions—McCann, Bates and JWT.

In average annual volume change in worldwide gross income and billings, Y&R paced the lists with $44 million and $293.6 million, respectively. Following No. 2 Saatchi in those categories were Ogilvy and Bates in that order. An agency needed an average income growth of at least $41.4 million to make the top four.

Ogilvy led in average annual volume change in U.S. gross income with $28.4 million for the 10-year period, nudging out Y&R with $28.3 million. Y&R slipped by Ogilvy on the U.S. billings side, however, with $188.9 million to Ogilvy's $187.1 million.

HCM remained at the bottom in average annual volume change in U.S. income and billings as a result of its carving up by Y&R and Eurocom.#

Key to profile information

Data in agency profiles was obtained from agencies which received and completed a questionnaire prepared by ADVERTISING AGE.

Agencies were asked to provide gross income and total volume, the latter identified as the sum of media billings, billings to the client for materials and services and capitalized fees—a method of equating fees to billings by treating the raw fee as if it were the 15% commission the agency earned by billing an amount 6.67 times the raw fee.

Gross income in the traditional agency structure is the sum of the 15% commission earned from the media billings, the markup (usually 17.65%) for materials and services billed the client, and the raw fee. Where the profile states gross income as an estimate, it was provided by ADVERTISING AGE.

This year marked the first attempt to obtain a geographic breakout of agency billings. When agencies did not comply with this request made in the questionnaire, their regional billings were estimated whenever possible.

Also new to the 1985 reporting was a further break out of an agency's U.S. billings into the many forms of direct response advertising.

The questionnaire sought figures for both 1985 and 1984 to obtain a year-to-year reading of this growing media activity.

This year also marked the second year in which agencies provided voluntary verification from an independent accountant for the figures they reported. Those agencies providing a signature were noted in this issue by a check mark within a box in the profile of the agency. About one-third of the agencies signed this statement:

The undersigned, acting as outside accountant for the agency, confirms that the U.S. income figure indicated above for the year 1985 reflects totals as entered on the books of the company for the period reported.

Several variations of this statement were accepted including a more formal letter authored in 1984 by the New York State Society of CPAs under the direction of Gene F. Gaughan, chairman of the society (See statement below).

N.Y. cpa statement accepted

To agency board of directors:

We (the accounting firm) have applied certain agreed-upon procedures, as discussed below, to the accounting records of (give name of agency) for the year ended Dec. 31, 1985, solely to assist you in preparing your report to appear in the "1985 Agency Income Report" to be published by ADVERTISING AGE on March 27.

It is understood that our report on your accounting records is solely for your information and is not to be referred to or distributed for any purpose to anyone who is not a member of management of your agency without our consent. You may attach a copy of this letter to your agency's report to ADVERTISING AGE.

Our procedure was to confirm total 1985 "U.S. Income" of (the amount is given) shown on Line 1 of the agency income questionnaire agreed with the balances in general ledgers or other financial records maintained by your agency and its U.S. affiliates.

Because the above procedure does not constitute an examination made in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards, we do not express an opinion on any of the accounts or items referred to above.

In connection with the procedure referred to above, no matters came to our attention that caused us to believe that "U.S. Income" should be adjusted. Had we performed additional procedures or had we completed or made an examination of the financial statements in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards, matters might have come to our attention that would have been reported to you.

This report relates only to the accounts and items specified here and does not extend to any financial statements of your agency taken as a whole.
